2-2017

Empathy

Casey Golomski

University of New Hampshire, Durham, casey.golomski@unh.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholars.unh.edu/anth_facpub

Part of the Medical Humanities Commons, Other Arts and Humanities Commons, Poetry Commons, Psychiatric and Mental Health Commons, Social and Cultural Anthropology Commons, and the Substance Abuse and Addiction Commons

https://scholars.unh.edu/anth_facpub/5

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Anthropology at University of New Hampshire Scholars' Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Anthropology Scholarship by an authorized administrator of University of New Hampshire Scholars' Repository. For more information, please contact nicole.hentz@unh.edu.
I met the limit of empathy in the limit of language to talk about comorbidities, bound up in an other’s drinking:
to agonal breathing,
to unconsciousness,
and debility.

Do you remember us?
We’ve been to this unit thirteen times since September. We called the police.
Clinically, each time
you want a verbal affirmation—“Do you feel you want to die?”

I met the limit of empathy
in the in-ability to gauge the interpretive threshold of suicidality,
in slow,
mute death.

I met the limit of empathy
long after one bleary day, when light opaquely let itself in the ICU’s ten inch-wide window and from which one can only see a brick wall.

The bays were rounded in a half-ring. Pain cut back, for now, with stomach injections, respirators, and Ativan. “No one came to see me,” he said, wet and blinking.

That year his psychiatrist came around once every month and a half—a fellowship at Harvard, then at McLean.
The hospitalists were many though:
after every admission,
they were different every day.