FOREWORD

The basis of this little volume is a lecture which was originally prepared for delivery before the Conway Woman's Club, in March 1921, and which was repeated, with some additions, under the auspices of the Men's Club of the Universalist Church in Concord, a year later. On each of these occasions there was a very intelligent and appreciative audience in attendance, among those present in Concord being Governor Brown, Secretary of State Bean, and Judge Corning, President of the New Hampshire Historical Society, as well as many others of prominence, all of whom expressed great satisfaction with the lecture, and the hope that it might be published, in some form, in the near future.

In view of these expressions and the fact that in Old Home Week of 1923 the 300th anniversary of the settlement of the State, at Portsmouth and Dover in the spring of 1623, is to be formally celebrated, by virtue of a joint resolution passed by the last Legislature, providing for a Commission to make the preliminary arrangements therefor, the lecture in question, somewhat elaborated and extended, is presented in the following pages, illustrated by portraits of a few of those persons whose lives and labors have been a part of New Hampshire's contribution to the life and progress of the nation at large.

From early boyhood the writer has been interested in the history of New Hampshire, and particularly in the lives of those who have aided in giving the state the proud position it holds among the states of the Union. What first called his attention in this direction was a little poem on "New Hampshire," published in the old "Boston Cultivator," about 75 years ago, the only lines of which he can now recall being these:

"Her names of Burke and Woodbury,
Of Webster and of Cass,
Pierce, Greeley, Hale and Atherton,
No sister states surpass."

It was not until many years later that the identity of the author of this poem, which appeared over the pen name of "Jack," who subsequently became one of the successful educators of the country and who is mentioned in the body of this work, became known to the writer.

If there ever was a time when the thought of every loyal resident, or absent son and daughter, of the old Granite State should be turned toward its grand, historic record, and the lives and achievements of those who have made that record what it is, that time is now, upon the near approach of the great anniversary occasion to which reference has been made. If this modest publication shall contribute in any measure to the furtherance of such object; if it shall stimulate in the minds of any a deeper love for the state of their birth or the home of their adoption, and stronger pride in its magnificent contribution to the nation's history and especially if it shall call effective attention of those in authority to the crying need of a simple, but comprehensive history of New Hampshire, for universal use in our public schools, the writer will feel abundantly rewarded for his work.

NEW HAMPSHIRE IN HISTORY

The strongest incentive to future progress is the knowledge of past achievement, in individual, state or national life.

Familiarity with local, state or national history develops civic pride, which is the basis of true patriotism and the surest guaranty of loyal citizenship.

New Hampshire is one of the smallest states in the Union. Territorially it embraces less than one 300th part of the entire forty-eight states. Its soil is rugged; its climate severe, and all its conditions adverse to the prolific production of material wealth; yet through the patient industry and sturdy effort of those who have tilled its soil in generations past, it has produced larger crops per acre than any other state.

It is reported that once on a time an inquisitive Westerner asked a distinguished representative of the state what they raised in New Hampshire: He replied—"They raise men," using the term, of course in a generic sense, including men and women. In this he was, indeed, right. More men and women, who have made a marked impress for good upon the life of the nation at large, have been born in New Hampshire than in any other State in the Union, in proportion to population, and it would almost be safe to say it without the qualification as to population.

The struggle against the adverse conditions, to which reference has been made, has contributed to the fuller development of the physical, mental and moral powers of the people, so that, at home or abroad, whenever their lot has been cast, the sons and daughters of New Hampshire have made a record in character and achievement, comparing most favorably with that of any other State.

Some inquiring person who looked the matter up, finds that of the 23,000 men and women whose names were found in the 1919 edition of "Who's Who in America," 352, or one in every 65, were born in New Hampshire, although the total population of the State is less than one 250th part of the total of the country at large.

The people of a state which has contributed so much to the life and progress of the nation should be proud of its history, and teach their children to cherish a like sentiment of loyalty and devotion. I venture to suggest, moreover, that the study of New Hampshire history should be made a part of the curriculum, in all the schools of the State above the primary grades, and that the state government should take steps, at once, to secure the compilation and publication of a proper text book for use in the schools in carrying out such purpose.

Of the 258 cities and towns in the state, only about 75, or less than one-third of the entire number, have published histories, and many of these are of comparatively ancient date and far from being complete. It is most desirable that every town, which has not already done so, should take measures at once to secure the preparation and publication of as complete and accurate a history as possible.

It is not my purpose, here, to deal with the history of New Hampshire, in general or detail. To do either in a satisfactory manner would require an extended series of addresses whose publication would fill a large volume. I am simply to speak of "New Hampshire in History"—to consider, briefly, New Hampshire's part in the upbuilding of our republic—its contribution to the life of the nation and the progress of the world. Some reference, however, to the beginnings of the State and the development of its government may properly be made in the outset.

What white man, or men, first saw the New Hampshire coast is now unknown. The Norse explorers of the 10th century, may or may not have landed at Hampton Beach, as some ancient legends have it. Whether they did or not is immaterial; nor does it matter whether or not Bartholomew Gosnold, the early English explorer, who visited the coast of Maine in 1602, and made his way thence to Cape Cod, observed any part of New Hampshire as he pursued his voyage. It seems to be admitted that Martin Pring, who came over from England in 1603, with an expedition of 43 men, in two small vessels, was the first Englishman who really visited the New Hampshire coast. He is credited with having sailed up the Piscataqua River for several miles, and must consequently have seen, if he did not land upon, the territory now occupied by Portsmouth and Dover.

In the following year a French expedition under De Monts, who was accompanied by Champlain, sailed along the same coast, and on the 16th day of July, as Champlain writes, a party from the expedition made a landing at a point or cape, since determined to be Odiorne's Point in the present town of Rye, where they met some of the natives and gave them small presents. This is the first credible account of the landing of any white men on the New Hampshire shore. Nothing came however, of the visits of either Pring or

De Monts, and it was not until after the visit of Capt. John Smith, with a small party from his Monhegan Island expedition, to the Isles of Shoals, in the summer of 1614, that any attention was directed to this region. He made a map of the coast, and gave a glowing description of the country on his return to England. To the islands, which he traversed extensively, he gave his own name, calling them "Smith's Islands," and at his suggestion the name of New England was applied to the country at large.

In 1622 Sir Ferdinando Gorges and Capt. John Mason received from the King of England a grant of all the territory between the Merrimack and Sagadahoc rivers, and running back to the great lakes, the same being then named "Laconia." They proceeded to form a company, with a view to settlement, and in the following spring sent over an expedition, in two parties, one headed by David Thompson, and the other by Edward and William Hilton. Thompson's party landed at Little Harbor, then included in the territory of Portsmouth or "Strawberry Bank," but now in Rye; while the Hiltons went up the river to Dover Point, and there located. A year or two later Thompson and his party, who had become dissatisfied with their location, abandoned the same and removed to an island in Boston Harbor, and it was not till several years later that any permanent settlement was made at Portsmouth. The Dover settlement continued, however, and was undoubtedly the first permanent settlement in the state.* Here, in 1633, the first church building in New Hampshire was erected, the present First Parish Church in Dover being its legitimate successor.

In her thrilling poem, entitled "New Hampshire," written for the 250th anniversary celebration of the settlement of the state, by the N. H. Historical Society; Edna Dean Proctor, New Hampshire's female poet laureate, speaks as follows:

"A goodly realm, said Captain Smith,
Scanning the coast by the Isles of Shoals,
While the wind blew fair as in Indian myth,
Blows the breeze from the land of souls;
Blew from the marshes of Hampton, spread
Level and green that summer day,
And over the brow of Great Boar's Head,
From the pines that stretched to the West away.
And sunset died on the rippling sea,
Ere to the south, with the wind, sailed he.
But he told the story in London streets

*This is in accordance with the account adopted by Belknap and other early historians; but recent writers have sought to make it appear that the Dover settlement was not made until a later indefinite date.

And again to court and prince and king.
"A truce," men cried, "to Virginia heats—
The North is the land of Hope and Spring!"
And in sixteen hundred and twenty-three,
For Dover meadows and Portsmouth river,
Bold and earnest, they crossed the sea,
And the realm was theirs and ours forever!"

For fifteen years these settlements remained the only white settlements within the limits of what is now the state of New Hampshire. Fishing and trading with the Indians were the primary objects of the first settlers, and no more attention was paid to agriculture than was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of life for the first few years, notwithstanding the superior richness of the soil in the adjacent country, where now are found some of the finest farms in the state.

In 1638 two other settlements were made—one at Hampton and one at Exeter, the former headed by Rev. Stephen Bachilor, and the latter by Rev. John Wheelock, both noted religious leaders of their day, and the settlements largely made up of their devoted followers.

These four settlements—Dover, Portsmouth, Hampton and Exeter—were practically all there were in the province for more than 40 years, their grants covering the entire eastern portion of what is now Rockingham county and the larger part of Strafford. Each had its own local government and enacted its own laws, though acknowledging allegiance to the British crown, and nominally under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts. It may properly be stated that there were fishing settlements on the Isles of Shoals, which were partly within New Hampshire limits, though of transient and changing nature, nearly if not quite as early as any on the mainland, but there is no recorded evidence of any government or organization there, till considerably later.

In March 1679-80 a separate government was set up for the New Hampshire province, with a Governor, or President as then called, Council and Assembly,—the Governor and Council being named by the King and the Assembly chosen by the people of the several towns or settlements. John Cutt was appointed President. The call for the Assembly included the names of the men in the several settlements entitled to vote of whom there were 71 in Portsmouth, 60 in Dover, 57 in Hampton and 20 in Exeter.

This first General Assembly of New Hampshire, which met at Portsmouth on the 16th day of March, 1679-80, enacted a "body of laws," establishing courts, providing for trial by jury, prescribing severe penalties for various crimes, levying taxes, fixing the age of majority, etc. Representatives were chosen annually thereafter, and the assembly met once each year, or oftener, Portsmouth being the meeting place for the first four assemblies. The fifth met at Great Island or Newcastle, as it is now known, which had formerly been a part of Portsmouth. Subsequently the meetings were sometimes held in Portsmouth and sometimes in Newcastle.

It was not until the Eighth Assembly, in 1692, that a representative appeared from any settlement outside the four originally named. At that time one came in from the Isles of Shoals, the southern portion of which belonged to New Hampshire and subsequently became the town of Gosport, where quite a settlement of fishermen was located.

Meanwhile, from December 20, 1686, New Hampshire became a part of the Royal Province of New England, including all the territory now included in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, to which Connecticut was subsequently added, which arrangement continued about three years; then followed a year with no province government at all, and in 1690 a union with Massachusetts was effected which continued till 1692, when separate government for New Hampshire was again established.

In the Tenth Assembly, which held two sessions, in Newcastle, October 18, 1693 to May 24, 1694, that town first had representation, two delegates appearing therefor, while Dover had three, Portsmouth three, Exeter two, Hampton three, and the Isles of Shoals one. The Fourteenth Assembly which held two sessions, met once in Hampton. In the Twenty-third Assembly, covering the time from July, 1704 to November, 1714, the town of Kingston (then known as Kingstown) had a representative. Stratham came in, in the Twenty-sixth, in 1716, and Hampton Falls in the Twenty-eighth, in 1718. Rye was the next town to have representation, then Londonderry, Greenland, Newington and Durham, followed, later, by Newmarket. Concord came in, in the Forty-third assembly, in 1745, as did Chester and South Hampton, and there were gradual accessions, as settlements had been extended, till, in 1775, there were thirty-four towns and places, represented by thirty-five members, some having two or more members, and some members representing two or more classed towns each.

Many towns had been established in the southern part of the province, up the Merrimack valley, in the southwestern section and along up the Connecticut, and the province had been divided into five counties—Rockingham, Strafford, Hillsborough, Cheshire and Grafton. The settlers had endured hardship and privation, suffered from Indian depredations, hard winters and crop failures, but had developed strength of character and a spirit of independence.

It was about this time that New Hampshire began to take a prominent part in the making of American history, although the people of the province had rendered their full share of service in the French and Indian wars in the middle of the century, which had resulted twice in the siege and capture of Louisburg by the forces under command of Sir William Pepperell, a New Hampshire man; the reduction and capture of Crown Point, and the conquest and capture of Canada from the French. More than 2,500 New Hampshire men had been engaged in the service, of whom 500 had been engaged in the last seige of Louisburg and as many at Crown Point.

The independent spirit had begun to assert itself, however, at an even earlier date. The Assembly, elected by and responsible to the people, had all along claimed the right to determine who should be admitted to membership therein, and refused to allow men to occupy seats who had been called by the Governor from places not previously represented. This disagreement became so sharp that during the entire life of the Forty-fifth General Assembly, from 1749 to 1751 inclusive, there was no legislation at all enacted.

The impositions put upon the colonies by the British government had long been resented. The Stamp Act, followed by the tax on tea, and other oppressive imposts, had so aroused the indignation of the people that armed resistance seemed imminent; while the manifest purpose of the government to enforce its edicts by military power kindled the fire of revolution in the popular mind.

It was on New Hampshire soil, on the night of December 17, 1774, that the first overt act of the Revolution was performed. This was the assault upon Fort William and Mary, at Newcastle, by a party of patriots, led by John Sullivan of Durham and John Langdon of Portsmouth, which resulted in the capture and taking away of a large quantity of gunpowder and other munitions, the small garrison being taken by surprise and no bloodshed ensuing. This powder, by the way, as is generally known, was furnished to the patriot forces, who fought at Bunker Hill, nearly two-thirds of whom were New Hampshire men under Stark and Reid, stationed at the "rail fence," who held their ground and covered the retreat of the Massachusetts men from the hill, thus preventing the threatened rout, and turning what seemed at first a disastrous defeat into a practical victory for the patriot forces, in that it demonstrated their valor, and ability to resist effectively the trained forces of Great Britain. It was in this contest, that one of the bravest and most promising of New Hampshire's soldiers lost his life—Maj. Andrew McClary of Epsom, who was struck by a stray cannon shot near the close of the action.

The population of New Hampshire at this time, as shown by the census of 1775, was 82,200. Portsmouth, then regarded as the capital, was by far the largest town, having a population of 4,590. Second in population was Londonderry, then including what is now Derry, Windham, a part of Manchester, and some other territory, which then had 2,590 inhabitants. Exeter had 1,741, Dover 1,666, Rochester 1,548, Amherst 1,428 and Durham 1,214.

It is proper to mention that from May 17, 1774, till January 1776, no legislation was enacted in the province, and no regularly constituted government existed during a considerable portion of the time. The Assembly, whose members were chosen by the people, and were generally imbued with a patriotic spirit and a disregard for the royal prerogative, could not, or would not, conform to the demands of the Governor, Sir John Wentworth, who, while a native of the province, and sincerely desirous of promoting its material interests, was a thorough loyalist, and would brook nothing which, to his mind, smacked of disloyalty to the King and mother country.

Because of the disloyal or insubordinate spirit manifested, the Governor had dismissed the General Assembly in June, 1774. He soon came to realize that revolution was "in the air." His efforts to secure men to go to the assistance of Gen. Gage, the British commander in Boston, in the erection of barracks for his troops, were unavailing, as nobody would respond, and his proclamation ordering the arrest and punishment of the men engaged in the assault on Fort William and Mary, fell flat and was utterly ignored. He remained in Portsmouth, however, for some time longer, though little respect was shown for his authority by the people generally, and he was subjected at times to actual indignity, so that he finally repaired to the fort, and in August, 1775, embarked for Boston, remaining some time under the protection of the British fleet or army, and later departing for England, where he remained till the close of the war.

It is proper to remark in this connection that Sir John Wentworth, whose knightly title came later in life, was really the best, the most enterprising and progressive, of all the royal governors. He was a pioneer in the cause of advanced education, and was mainly instrumental in the establishment of Dartmouth College. He really originated the "Summer home" movement, which in later years has done so much to promote the prosperity of the State, by establishing a summer home for himself on the shore of Smith's Pond, (since called Lake Wentworth in his honor) in Wolfeboro, and erecting there a fine residence. Moreover he did more than all his predecessors to promote the building of roads in the province, extending them to the new settlements, and particularly to the northward, with the view of making direct communication with Canada, a scheme which had it not been interrupted by war might ultimately have made Portsmouth instead of Boston the great commercial city of

New England, and the main seaport of the North Atlantic coast.

But although government under royal prerogative had disappeared, the people of the colony were alive to their own interests, and representatives, duly chosen from the several towns, met in convention or Congress to consider the situation and take such action as might be deemed expedient. Five of these Provincial Congresses were called and held between July, 1774 and December, 1775, all at Exeter. The first of these met July 21, 1774, having been called through the action of the members of the Assembly which although dissolved by the Governor, had been recalled by the Committee of Correspondence,—a body whose previous appointment by the Assembly had been objected to by the Governor. This Congress elected delegates to a General Congress of the Colonies, to be held in Philadelphia, and John Sullivan and Nathaniel Folsom were the men chosen; while John Wentworth (the Speaker of the Assembly, not Governor John) Meshech Weare, Josiah Bartlett, Christopher Toppan and John Pickering, were named as a Committee to “instruct” the delegates and to name others in their places, if necessary.

A second Congress was held January 22, 1775, and a third on April 25 of the same year, the latter called because of the crisis precipitated by the conflict of April 19, at Lexington and Concord, Mass., the transactions of which body were kept a profound secret; but it was succeeded, on May 17, following by a fourth Congress, whose session continued over a period of six months, and which, early in its deliberations, adopted a resolution "in view of the evident purpose of the British government to subjugate this and the other American Colonies to the most abject slavery," providing for the raising immediately of 2,000 effective men in the province, including officers and those already in service, their enrollment to continue until the last day in December, unless the Committee of Safety should deem it proper that a part or the whole be discharged sooner.

This Committee of Safety, which was appointed on the same day, was a body of supreme importance, clothed with power to co-operate with Congress, and the successive legislatures relative to the common defence and the prosecution of the war, and authorized to deal with all emergencies that might arise when the legislature was not in session. As originally named the Committee consisted of Matthew Thornton, Josiah Bartlett, William Whipple, Nathaniel Folsom and Ebenezer

Thompson. Other members were soon after added among them being Meshech Weare, who became chairman in 1776, and continued throughout the war.

The Fifth Provincial Congress, called for December 21, 1775, voted on December 28, to take up the matter of establishing a form of civil government, and Matthew Thornton, Meshech Weare, Ebenezer Thompson, Wiseman Claggett and Benjamin Giles were appointed a committee "to frame and bring in a draft or plan of a new Constitution for the rule and government of the colony." The Committee proceeded with its work, and on the 5th day of January, following, its report was accepted and adopted, and the new independent government was put in operation, six months before the Declaration of Independence by the Continental Congress, at Philadelphia, and the first of all the independent colonial governments to be established.

Thus New Hampshire was at the very front in the great struggle for American independence, not only in the military but in the civil point of view. Meshech Weare, who was the Governor (or rather President, as the chief executive was called under this first Constitution) all through the Revolution, and until the new State constitution was adopted in 1784, as well as Chairman of the Committee of Safety, was Washington's most trusted confidant and adviser; while John Langdon, sound in judgment but impetuous in action, was a tower of strength in every emergency. He it was through whose instrumentality Gen. Stark's Bennington expedition, which won the victory over the Hessians and turned the tide in favor of the patriot cause at a very critical emergency, was raised and equipped. The treasury was empty at the time and no means in sight for providing the needed funds. He was speaker of the House and finally addressed that body, saying: "I have $1,000 in hard money; I will pledge my plate for $3,000 more; I have 70 hogsheads of Tobago rum which I will sell for the most it will bring. They are at the service of the State." The expedition was raised, and Langdon himself, who was a soldier as well as a civilian leader served therein, and fought afterward, as a captain of volunteers, at Stillwater and Saratoga.

No other state, large or small, contributed such a galaxy of heroic names to the military history of the Revolution, as did New Hampshire, including Stark, Sullivan, Reid, Poor, Cilley, Scammell, Dearborn and a host of others of lesser fame, but no less courage and devotion.

Sullivan was Washington's strong dependence in the field, as was Weare in civil affairs. He commanded the left wing of the army at the siege of Boston; was with Washington in the trying New Jersey campaign, sharing the sufferings of Valley Forge, commanding the right wing at the passage of the Delaware, the capture of the Hessians at Trenton, at the battle of Princeton, with John Stark in the van, and at Brandywine and Germantown. He led the famous expedition against Britain's savage allies, the Six Nations or Mohawk Indians, in western New York in 1777. These Indians had been for a long time, conducting a "fire in the rear," so to speak, and greatly hampering the patriot cause, and it became necessary to suppress their operations by decisive action. The expedition was an important and a dangerous one, and required a leader of the greatest courage and coolest judgment, and John Sullivan was selected for the part. The Indians were surprised in their villages, the latter destroyed and their forces utterly routed, the result being a victory no less substantial in effect than that of Stark at Bennington. Here it should be said that Gen. Enoch Poor was Sullivan's leading supporter in this expedition, and conducted himself no less gallantly than when he bore the brunt of battle at Stillwater, and led the advance at Saratoga.

All through the Revolution New Hampshire men were actively engaged in almost every conflict, and New Hampshire officers rendered conspicuous service. In the last crowning conflict—the siege of Yorktown—the state was prominently represented. Here Alexander Scammell of Durham, law student with John Sullivan at the opening of hostilities, who entered the service at once and fought gallantly to the end of the struggle, then Adjutant General of the Army, lost his life; and here Henry Dearborn of Nottingham, who led 60 minute men from that town to Cambridge in 36 hours, after the Lexington alarm, and was with Stark at Bunker Hill, was also in active service as Deputy Quartermaster General.

How many New Hampshire men were engaged in the military service of the country during the Revolutionary period can never be accurately determined. Prof. John K. Lord of Dartmouth College, a careful historian, in his article on New Hampshire in the Encyclopedia Britannica, put the total at 12,479. Adjutant General Harris of the War Department, replying to my recent inquiry, says: "From a report of the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, dated May 10, 1790, it appears that the number of troops and militia furnished from time to time by the State of New Hampshire, during the Revolutionary War, was 18,289." He adds, however, that it is believed these figures are inaccurate, as they undoubtedly contain many duplications, resulting from re-enlistments, etc., but they are furnished from the best data obtainable, and are given for what they are worth. It is probable that the figures furnished by Prof. Lord are more nearly correct; but even these show a remarkable percentage of men in the service. Twelve thousand soldiers, out of a total population of 80,000 people, is a wonderful demonstration of the patriotism of the State.

Here it may be said, as well as anywhere, that in all subsequent wars of the Republic New Hampshire performed her part bravely and well. In the war of 1812, sometimes called "the second war for independence," although largely fought on the water, in contests between individual vessels of war on either side, and involving the enlistment of comparatively few men in the military service, there were about 2,000 New Hampshire men enlisted; while a New Hampshire man, General Henry Dearborn, was the commander of all the forces enrolled, and another New Hampshire officer, General James Miller, who led the brilliant charge at Lundy's Lane in the battle of Bridgewater in Canada, and commanded a division at the battle of Lake Erie, and who was called by Hawthorne "New England's most distinguished soldier," was the hero of the greatest exploit on land, always excepting the battle of New Orleans, fought by General Jackson, after the war was really over and the peace treaty actually signed. It was on the northern border, in fact, that the land conflict was largely fought, though, in a hurried raid by the British, the capitol at Washington was burned. Other New Hampshire officers distinguishing themselves in the contest, at Chippewa, Niagara and Fort Erie, were Generals John McNeil of Hillsboro, and Eleazer W. Ripley, native of Hanover.

During the Civil War, New Hampshire contributed 32,750 men to the Union Army, a larger proportionate number, it is claimed, than any other State. The first blood shed in the contest was that of a native of New Hampshire, Luther C. Ladd, born in the town of Alexandria, December 22, 1843, who fell during the passage of the 6th Massachusetts Regiment, of which he was a member, through the city of Baltimore, April 19, 1861, the troops having been attacked by a mob of Southern sympathizers, and several of their number wounded, two mortally, of whom young Ladd was one.

All through the war New Hampshire soldiers were in the thick of the fight, and the best blood of the State was freely shed, all the way from Bull Run to Appomattox. The names of Porter, Foster, Cram, Marston, Griffin, Bedel, Harriman, Bell, Henderson, Whipple, Lull, Cross, Putnam, Gardiner, Quarles, Briggs, Stevens, Blair, Farr, Clough, Patterson and a host of others, of the gallant sons of the State, who distinguished themselves in the contest, will long remain a galaxy of honor on the pages of our national history. While so many served bravely and well it is bestowing no invidious distinction if special mention be made of the gallant commanders of New Hampshire regiments, Haldimand S. Putnam of Cornish, of the Seventh, who fell in leading the desperate assault upon Fort Wagner, Louis Bell of Chester, mortally wounded at Fort Fisher, and Everett E. Cross of Lancaster, of the "Fighting Fifth," who died at Gettysburg. The last named regiment, be it noted, had the reputation of losing more men in action than any other Union regiment during the war.

Nor was it on land alone, that the sons of the Granite State rendered splendid service in the war for the Union. The records of the Navy contain no names more brilliant than those of Rear Admirals George E. Belknap, John G. Walker, Enoch G. Parrott and George H. Wadleigh, Commodore George H. Perkins, and Capt. James S. Thornton, the first of whom fired the last shot at the evacuation of Charleston, and the last was the executive officer of the Kearsarge, under Commodore Winslow, in the famous fight with the "Alabama," under the Confederate Admiral Semmes, which resulted in the sinking of the latter vessel, which had become a veritable "scourge of the seas."

Special mention is also due the memory of Commodore Tunis A. M. Craven, native of Portsmouth, who as Commander of the Monitor Tecumseh, fired the first shot at the battle of Mobile Bay, and gallantly went to his death, when his vessel sank as the result of an explosion.

And here it may well be stated that it was at Portsmouth, N. H., that the Kearsarge was built, the solid oak for its framework having been cut from the foot hills of Kearsarge Mountain in Warner, by Joseph Barnard of Hopkinton, and its gallant crew, composed largely of New Hampshire men, just as in the earlier Revolutionary days, when British cruisers were sweeping the meagre shipping of the colonies from the sea, it was in the same harbor of Portsmouth, and from New Hampshire timber, that the dashing little "Ranger," also manned in great part by New Hampshire men, which Paul Jones led to victory in many an ocean contest, was built and fitted out by John Langdon, as Continental Naval Agent for New Hampshire and from whose mast head the Stars and Stripes were first unfurled to the ocean breeze.

The Mexican war, which has been passed over, and the Spanish-American War, both of which were brought about through the spirit of conquest and exploitation, rather than pure patriotism, and waged against weaker instead of stronger nations, so far as this country was concerned, also commanded the services of New Hampshire men in ample measure. In the former conflict Gen. Franklin Pierce won distinction under Gen. Scott in the march upon and capture of the Mexican Capital, and it was Captain Edgar A. Kimball, native of Pembroke, who led the 9th Infantry at Chapultepec, scaled the walls of the fortress, cut down the Mexican flag, and received the surrender, displaying the same heroism that he afterwards manifested, when at the head of the 9th New York, he stormed the fort on Roanoke Island, in the Civil War. Other New Hampshire men rendering gallant service in Mexico were Joseph H. Potter, of Concord, afterward a brigadier general in the U. S. Army, who was wounded at Monterey, and Albemarle Cody of Keene, breveted major for gallantry at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Churnbusco and Molino del Rey.

In the Spanish War, Gen. Leonard Wood, native of Winchester, who had already proved his courage and capacity in Indian fighting at the West, came conspicuously to the front, and it was in his hands that the administration of affairs in Cuba, during the period of reconstruction after the war, was placed. In this contest, too, the veteran Gen. Joab N. Patterson, native of Hopkinton, now the last surviving New Hampshire officer earning a general's rank in the Civil War, again entered the service although well past three score years of age, going out as a Captain in the First N. H. Regiment, serving on the staff of Gen. J. P. Sanger, and afterward serving as superintendent of public buildings in Havana, under Gen. Wood.

In the last great "World War," fought for the salvation of civilization by the allied powers of Europe and America against the military despotism of Germany and its allies, New Hampshire contributed her full quota. About 22,000 of her young men were in the service, of whom 250 were killed in battle and some 400 more died of wounds and disease. Whether these dead, with millions of others, who made the supreme sacrifice, died in vain, or not, still remains to be determined. It is well to remember, in this connection, at all events, that the first American force to be engaged in actual conflict on the European front, in this great struggle, was a contingent from the U. S. Marine Corps, under the command of the late Gen. Charles H. Doyen, a son of New Hampshire, native of Concord.

Having considered New Hampshire's service in the nation's wars, and her contribution to the military history of the country, let us revert to her part in the affairs of civil government, and public and professional life.

While the State, through the Governor or President, the Legislature and Committee of Safety, co-operated heartily with the Continental Congress all through the Revolutionary period, it contributed some of its ablest and best men to the membership of that body, among them being Josiah Bartlett, John and Woodbury Langdon, Nicholas Gilman, John Sullivan, Nathaniel Folsom, George Frost, Samuel Livermore and Nathaniel Peabody, than whom none more patriotic or efficient were furnished by any state. The first signature attached to the Declaration of Independence, following that of John Hancock, president of the Continental Congress, was that of Josiah Bartlett, delegate from New Hampshire. The first signatures to the Constitution of the United States, as originally drawn and adopted in Convention, September 17, 1787, following that of George Washington, president and deputy from Virginia, were those of John Langdon and Nicholas Gilman, deputies from New Hampshire.

Ratification by nine of the thirteen states was required to give the Constitution validity, and it was the action of the New Hampshire legislature, done in Concord, June 21, 1788, that put the approval of the ninth state upon the document in question, and gave it life and power, just as it was the action of the legislature of Tennessee, in the summer of 1790, that made the 19th amendment to the same Constitution a part of the fundamental law, and raised ten millions of American women from a legal level with paupers, lunatics, idiots and criminals to the plane of full citizenship, along with the men of the nation.

When the Constitution finally went into operation, and a government was established under its provisions, a New Hampshire man, John Langdon, was chosen President pro tem of the Senate, presided over that body when the votes for President of the United States were counted, and officially notified the President-elect, George Washington, of his election.

Among the many eminent men who have served New Hampshire in the Senate since that time, were Samuel Livermore, also president pro tem, William Plumer, Nicholas Gilman, Jeremiah Mason, Levi Woodbury, Samuel Bell, Isaac Hill, Franklin Pierce, Charles G. Atherton, John P. Hale (the first anti-slavery Senator), Daniel Clark, president pro tem, Edward H. Rollins, and William E. Chandler.

In the lower branch of Congress her representatives have held high rank and have included such men as Nicholas Gilman, Abiel Foster, Jeremiah Smith, Jonathan Freeman, George B. Upham, Thomas W. Thompson, James Wilson, George Sullivan, Daniel Webster, Charles H. Atherton, Arthur Livermore, Matthew Harvey, Ichabod Bartlett, John Brodhead, Henry Hubbard (speaker pro tem 23rd Congress), Jared W. Williams, Edmund Burke, Amos Tuck, George W. Morrison, Harry Hibbard, Mason W. Tappan, Gilman Marston, James W. Patterson, Aaron F. Stevens, Hosea W.

Parker, Austin F. Pike, Samuel N. Bell and James F. Briggs.

A small state, New Hampshire has given to the nation but a single President—Franklin Pierce; but that is more than most of the states, large or small, have done. That President, although spoken of as an “accident” and “unknown,” by some men and newspapers of that day, and later viciously traduced by his political opponents, was a man of whom no son or daughter of the Granite State ever had reason to be ashamed. He had served ably in both branches of the national Congress, and on the battlefield in his country’s service in time of war, and was a distinguished member of the bar, unsurpassed as an advocate. Though he did not rank in military service with Washington or Jackson, or in constructive statesmanship with Jefferson or Madison, he was, unquestionably, the most courteous gentleman who ever occupied the presidential chair, as well as the most finished orator, and was the first President to deliver his inaugural address without manuscript.

While only one native of the State has been elected to the presidency, four others have been the candidates of different parties for the office at different times. Lewis Cass was the Democratic nominee in 1848;

John P. Hale was the candidate of the Free Soil or Abolition party in 1852 when Gen. Pierce was elected; Horace Greeley was nominated by the Independent Republicans and endorsed by the Democrats in 1872, and in 1884 Gen. Benjamin F. Butler was the nominee of the Greenbackers and People's party, with the hope that the Democrats would endorse the nomination, which they failed to do, nominating and electing Grover Cleveland of New York, instead.

A goodly number of the native sons of New Hampshire—altogether more than her proportionate share—have been called to service in the Cabinet, under various administrations. Gen. Henry Dearborn, native of North Hampton, served as Secretary of War under President Jefferson. Levi Woodbury, native of Francestown, was for three years Secretary of the Navy, and three more Secretary of the Treasury under Jackson, and continued in the latter office under Van Buren. Lewis Cass, native of Exeter, was for a time Secretary of War, during Jackson's administration, and, later Secretary of State under Buchanan. Daniel Webster, native of Salisbury, was for two years Secretary of State under Harrison and Tyler, and for the same length of time, preceding his death, under Fillmore. Nathan Clifford, native of Rumney, was Attorney General under President Polk, and John A. Dix, born in Boscawen, was Secretary of the Treasury under Buchanan. He it was who gave utterance to the famous command—"If any man hauls down the American flag shoot him on the spot."

Salmon P. Chase, native of Cornish, was Secretary of the Treasury under Abraham Lincoln, and it was through his genius and ability that the war for the Union was successfully financed. He was succeeded in that position by William Pitt Fessenden, born in the town of Boscawen. Marshall Jewell, native of Winchester was Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Grant, Zachariah Chandler, native of Bedford, Secretary of the Interior and Amos T. Akerman, born in Keene, Attorney General. William E. Chandler, native of Concord, served as Secretary of the Navy under the administration of Chester A. Arthur, who came into office through the assassination of Garfield, and happily disappointed the country in giving it one of the best administrations in its history. Our last representative in the Cabinet is the present Secretary of War, close friend of President Harding, John W. Weeks, native and summer resident of the town of Lancaster.

The bench of the Supreme Court of the United State, known as the most august judicial tribunal in the world, has been graced and honored by one chief justice, born in New Hampshire, Salmon P. Chase, and two Associate Justices, Levi Woodbury and Nathan Clifford; while the first Chief Justice of the Court of Claims, was also a New Hampshire man—John J. Gilchrist of Charlestown. Three at least of the present U. S. Circuit Court Justices are New Hampshire men by birth—Walter H. Sanborn, native of Epsom, now and for many years resident of Minnesota, presiding justice of the 8th Circuit, and George H. Bingham of Manchester, native of Littleton, presiding justice, and George W. Anderson of Boston, born in Acworth, Justice of the 1st Circuit.

While New Hampshire men have not figured conspicuously in the diplomatic service of the government, the state has not been without representation in that direction. Ninety years ago Edmund Roberts of Portsmouth was commissioned as a special agent of the government to negotiate treaties of trade and commerce with Muscat, Siam and Japan. He completed his mission as far as the first two were concerned, but was taken ill and died on the way to Japan. Had he lived he would doubtless have succeeded with the latter, and thus opened the island empire to the commerce of the world, a quarter of a century earlier than was eventually done.

Gen. Henry Dearborn was accredited U. S. Minister to Portugal in 1822, and Charles P. Haddock, a Dartmouth College professor, was Charge de Affaires to that country for some years, a quarter of a century later. Other New Hampshire men, native or resident, who held office in this line, were Nathan Clifford, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, John A. Dix, Minister to France, John P. Hale, Minister to Spain, and Horatio G. Perry, Secretary of Legation, and Charge de Affaires to the same country; Christopher C. Andrews, Minister Resident to Sweden and Norway, George G. Fogg and Person C. Cheney, Ministers to Switzerland; George H. Bridgman, Minister to Bolivia; John T. Abbott and Luther F. McKinney, Ministers to Columbia, and George H. Moses, Minister to Greece and Montenegro. George Walker of Peterboro served for a time as Consul General to Paris, Benjamin F. Whidden of Lancaster as Consul General to Hayti, and Christopher C. Andrews was Consul General to Brazil. The first U. S. Consul abroad from New Hampshire was Tobias Lear of Portsmouth, who had been private Secretary to President Washington, who was commissioned to Algiers in 1803. Among those later in the consular service from this State were Claudius B. Webster, Consul to Liverpool, Joseph C. A. Wingate, Consul to Swatou, China; James A. Wood and James R. Jackson, Consuls to Sherbrooke, P. Q.; Frank H. Pierce and Elias H. Cheney, consuls to Matanzas, Cuba, the latter, still surviving at the age of 90 years, serving for some years later at Curacao.

It would be an impossible task to give in detail, New Hampshire's contribution to the public life of other States, and, through them, to the country at large. A few illustrations must suffice.

Five Governors of Maine were natives of the Granite State, viz: Jonathan G. Huntton, born in Unity; Samuel E. Smith of Hollis; Edward Kent, Concord; Samuel Wells, Durham, and Harris M. Plaisted, Jefferson. All these men were lawyers, and the first four held positions at one time or another on the bench of the Supreme Court, of which tribunal, John Appleton, native of New Ipswich, was for many years Chief Justice, while the latter also served in the National House of Representatives. The first United States Senator from Maine was John Chandler, a native of the town of Epping. Nathan Clifford, native of Rumney, heretofore mentioned, served as Attorney General of the State, and as a Representative in Congress, as did Jonathan Cilley, native of Nottingham, Robert Goodenow of Farmington, Rufus R. Goodenow of Henniker, and John J. Perry of Portsmouth. Mr. Cilley, who had previously served as Speaker of the State House of Representatives, and was a young man of great promise, was killed in a duel with Col. Graves of Kentucky, resulting from words spoken in debate. Jonas Cutting, native of Croydon, was for some time an associate Justice of the Maine Supreme Court, and Albert R. Savage, who went from Lancaster, held the same position and was, later, Chief Justice.

While Vermont has contributed to New Hampshire a large percentage of her leading lawyers, during the last seventy-five years, New Hampshire has given the Green Mountain State a goodly number of men who have been prominent in public affairs. Among these may be named three Governors—Samuel E. Pingree, native of Salisbury; Levi R. Fuller, native of Westmoreland, and Urban A. Woodbury, native of Acworth. Gov. Pingree by the way, who was a Civil War veteran, serving as lieutenant colonel in the Third Vermont Infantry, recently passed away at the age of 90 years. He had served 53 years as town clerk in Hartford, his home town, where he had practiced law for more than sixty years. One United States Senator, Dudley Chase, native of Cornish, who was afterward Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and two Representatives in Congress from Vermont, John Noyes and William Henry, were born in New Hampshire, as were three other Supreme Court judges—Hoyt H. Wheeler, native of Chesterfield, Wheelock G. Veazey, native of Brentwood, and John W. Rowell, born in Lebanon, the latter serving as Chief Justice. Col. Veazey, who was also a Civil War veteran, served many years, later, as a member of the U. S. Interstate Commerce Commission. Among many other New Hampshire born men prominent in Vermont affairs, may be named the late Augustus P. Huntoon of Bethel, eminent lawyer, native of the town of Groton, once speaker of the State House of Representatives; Fred A. Howland, born in Franconia, now president of the National Life Insurance Co., who has served as Secretary of State, and is now a member of the State Board of Education; Herbert D. Ryder, native of Acworth, leading lawyer in Bel-lows Falls, former County Attorney and member of the State Board of Education; Harry E. Parker of Bradford, prominent publisher and active in political affairs, native of Lyman, and Harry B. Amey, native of Pittsburg, in practice of law at Island Pond, State Senator and prosecuting at-torney.

Massachusetts, the old Bay State, from which many of our early settlers came, has been repaid, tenfold, for all her contribu-tions to New Hampshire. The greatest names in her history, since the Revolution-ary period, are those of men of New Hamp-shire birth—Daniel Webster and Henry Wilson, the one a Senator and Secretary of State, the other Senator and Vice-Presi-dent of the United States. Another Sena-tor, already mentioned as Secretary of War, went down from his native town of Lancaster; while three governors of the State,—Benjamin F. Butler, of Deerfield, John Q. A. Brackett of Bradford and Chan-ning H. Cox of Manchester, the present in-cumbent, were all of New Hampshire origin. While Gen. Butler was Governor it was remarked as a significant fact, that not only the Governor, but the President of the Senate, George E. Bruce, and the speaker of the House, George A. Marden, were all New Hampshire natives, the latter both sons of Mont Vernon, and graduates of Dartmouth College in the same class. In the following year, two other sons of New Hampshire, Albert E. Pillsbury, native of Milford, and John Q. A. Brackett, previously mentioned, also presided over the two branches of the Massachusetts legislature, Mr. Pillsbury subsequently serving as Attorney General of the State. Another New Hampshire man, William H. Haile, native of Chesterfield, then residing in Springfield, where he had been Mayor of the city, was nominated as Republican candidate for Governor but was defeated. Another New Hampshire man, Harvey Jewell, native of Winchester, a brother of Marshall Jewell previously mentioned, had been Speaker of the House of Representatives at an earlier date, and Joseph Bell, born in the town of Bedford, was President of the Senate in 1849.

Among New Hampshire born men who have represented Massachusetts districts in the National House of Representatives may be named Nathan Appleton, native of New Ipswich, William S. Damrell and Henry B. Lovering of Portsmouth, William

M. Richardson of Pelham; Tappan Wentworth of Dover, (who defeated Henry Wilson) Lorenzo Sabin of Lisbon, Goldsmith F. Bailey of Westmoreland, Benjamin F. Butler of Deerfield, Rufus S. Frost of Marlboro, Amasa Norcross of Rindge, and Samuel L. Powers of Cornish. William M. Richardson was also for a time Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, while a number of its Superior Court judges have also hailed from the Granite State, among them being Augustus L. Soule and Charles U. Bell, of Exeter, Daniel Aiken of Bedford, James B. Richardson of Hanover, Caleb Blodgett of Dorchester, and John H. Hardy of Hollis, as well as the newly appointed Chief Justice, Walter P. Hall, native of Manchester.

While speaking of New Hampshire's contribution to the public life of Massachusetts, it may be said, as well as anywhere, that a very large proportion of the men who have been prominent and successful in the official, professional, and business life of the City of Boston, were born and reared among the New Hampshire hills. Two sons of New Hampshire, at least, have been mayors of the city—Dr. Thomas L. Jenks, native of Conway, and Albert Palmer, native of Candia, who held the office at the same time when Gen. Butler was Governor, and Messrs. Bruce and Marden presided in the legislature, and it may be added that there is scarcely a city in the Bay State, but has had one or more New Hampshire born men at the head of its municipal government. Nathaniel Greene, native of Boscawen, was post-master of Boston for twelve years. Daniel Webster, great as a lawyer no less than as a statesman, was for many years in practice in Boston, and had for some time as his partner there, John P. Healey, native of Washington, who served for many years as City Solicitor, and was the first man to hold the office of Corporation counsel, which position by the way was recently tendered by the present mayor to another son of New Hampshire, Sherman L. Whipple, native of New London, who has been in the front rank among Boston lawyers for many years, and has been twice the candidate of the Democratic party for United States Senator. Mellen Chamberlain, a native of Pembroke, and a lawyer of ability, was for some years the Chief Justice of the Boston Municipal Court, while Henry S. Dewey, born in Hanover, William J. Forsaith, native of Newport, and several other New Hampshire born lawyers have been members of the same tribunal. Among the many names of New Hampshire men prominent at the Boston bar, at one time or another, may be mentioned such as Charles Levi Woodbury, native of Portsmouth, Augustus O. Brewster of Hanover, Horatio G. Parker of Keene, Nathan Morse of Moultonboro, Napoleon B. Bryant of Andover, Moody Merrill of Campton, Robert I. Burbank of Shelburne, Samuel L. Powers of Cornish, Wilbur H. Powers of Croydon, Joseph H. Wiggin of Exeter; Guy S. Cox of Manchester, John Herbert of Wentworth, George F. Bean of Bradford, and Joseph W. Lund and James A. Halloren of Concord, other members of the profession aside from those heretofore named as having occupied high official positions in the state.

The medical profession in Boston, no less than the legal, has drawn its strength largely from New Hampshire, as illustrated by such names as those of Dr. David W. Cheever, native of Portsmouth, appointed visiting surgeon for the Boston City Hospital when the institution was established, and continuing his valuable service in connection therewith for more than half a century, while he was for 33 years a lecturer in the Harvard Medical School, and at the same time engaged in an extensive and successful private practice; and of Dr. George W. Gay, native of Swanzey, long time surgeon for the City Hospital, instructor in and lecturer upon Clinical Surgery in Harvard Medical School, and ex-president of the Massachusetts Medical Society, who has recently retired after a successful professional career of nearly fifty years. Other New Hampshire born physicians, now in active practice in the city, include such men as Dr. Edward O. Otis, native of Rye, tuberculosis specialist, and Professor of Pulmonary Diseases in Tufts Medical School; Dr. William R. P. Emerson, native of Candia, national authority on the laws of nutrition, and his brother, Francis P. Emerson, ear, nose and throat specialist, and surgeon for the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary; Dr. Fred B. Lund, native of Concord, widely known for surgical skill and Dr. Nathaniel R. Mason, born in Conway, specialist in Obstetrics and Gynecology, and instructor in Harvard Medical School.

Many of the most prominent leaders in mercantile life, banking, real estate and all important lines of business in Boston found their way to the city from New Hampshire, including such men as Marsh of Jordan, Marsh & Co., Dutton of Houghton & Dutton, Stearns, Bonney and other dry goods merchants; John Carr, long time president of the First National Bank, who went down from the town of Antrim; Charles F. Weed, native of Claremont, vice-president and chief executive officer of the same institution at the present time, and a recognized leader in the city's commercial affairs; the Rollins brothers of E. H. Rollins and Sons, Merrill of Merrill, Oldham & Co., and other private bankers; Henry W. Savage and Loren D. Towle, extensive real estate operators, the latter of whom has recently donated to his native town of Newport a munificent sum for the erection of a new high school building, and scores in these and other lines who might be named.

Especially in hotel management have New Hampshire men been conspicuous at "The Hub" as evidenced by such names as Whipple, Lindsay, Barnes, Duncklee, Greenleaf, Mann, Johnson, and Merrow.

As in Boston, so largely throughout the State of Massachusetts, men of New Hampshire birth have been and are conspicuous in every line of action—in the conduct of municipal affairs, and in professional and business life. A record of the names and activities of New Hampshire men who have been prominent in Bay State affairs for a century past would fill a dozen volumes.

Rhode Island and Connecticut have not drawn largely from New Hampshire, so far as public service is concerned; but it may not be inappropriate to mention the fact that the ablest man whom the former state ever had in either branch of the Federal Congress—the late Thomas A. Jenks, father of the Civil Service Reform movement, came of New Hampshire ancestry, his father having been born and reared in the town of Newport, in the old ancestral home where the late Edward A. Jenks of Concord first saw the light; while Marshall Jewell, Governor of Connecticut and Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Grant, was a native of the town of Winchester. Arthur B. Calef, native of Sanbornton, was State Treasurer of Connecticut, and Allen Tenney, born in Lyme, and at one time Secretary of State in New Hampshire, presided in its State Senate.

New York is indebted to New Hampshire for John A. Dix, one of her most noted Governors, and a United States Senator, previously mentioned as a Secretary of the Treasury and a Minister to France; for Noah Davis, native of Haverhill, eminent as a lawyer and a Supreme Court Justice, who presided, by the way, over two of the most famous criminal trials ever held in the country—that of Edward S. Stokes for the murder of James Fisk, and of William M. Tweed, head of the notorious "Tweed ring," for corruption in office. Judge Davis also held a seat in Congress from one of the New York districts, as did John Dickson, native of Keene, credited with having made the first anti-slavery speech in Congress, Clark B. Cochrane, native of New Boston, Charles C. B. Walker of Walpole, and John O. Whitehouse of Rochester, among others. George P. Barker, born in the town of Rindge, one of the most noted lawyers of Buffalo, was for a time Attorney General of the State. He was a frequent opponent at the bar, of Millard Fillmore, afterward Vice President and President of the United States, and was said to be more than his match as a legal debater. Asa W. Tenney, native of Dalton, was a U. S. District Attorney and Judge of U. S. District Court in Brooklyn.

Rufus Blodgett, a native of Dorchester, son of that old Democratic "wheel-horse," who was accounted as Harry Bingham's right hand man in Grafton County politics, Jeremiah Blodgett, was a United States Senator from New Jersey for six years; and it is not too much to say that it was the spirit and energy, due to the New Hampshire blood in his veins, that gave Garrett A. Hobart of that state the prominence that made him the successful candidate of the Republican party for Vice-President, in 1896. His father was a native of Columbia in the County of Coos, in this state, and it may as well be added that Socrates Tuttle, an eminent lawyer, with whom he studied, and whose daughter he married, was a native of the same county, and a brother of the late Dr. Charles M. Tuttle of Littleton. Frederick Adams, native of Amherst, was a Judge of the Court of Errors and Appeals, and later of the U. S. District Court for New Jersey.

While there were quite a number of New Hampshire people among the pioneers of Ohio not so many representatives of the State became prominent in its public affairs or business life as in many others. Its most noted citizen, however, Governor, Senator, Secretary and Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, heretofore noted, was one of New Hampshire's most distinguished sons; while Edward E. Noyes, another Governor of the Buckeye State, although born across the line in Haverhill, Mass., was reared in New Hampshire, learned the printer's trade in Dover, was educated at Kingston Academy and Dartmouth College and studied law in Exeter, before locating in Ohio.

While there is no state in the great Central West and Northwest to whose development, along industrial and business lines, New Hampshire has not contributed in some measure, and in whose public, political and professional life her sons have not been conspicuous, the State of Michigan is pre-eminently indebted to her in this regard. The first governor, greatest statesman, and most distinguished citizen of the "Wolverine State"—Lewis Cass—heretofore mentioned, went out from New Hampshire, as did his scarcely less illustrious successor in the United States Senate, Zachariah Chandler. Another governor of the state was John S. Barry, native of the town of Amherst, the only man three times elected to the office. The State Constitution provides that no man can hold more than two terms in succession, but so great was Gov. Barry's popularity, that after holding two terms, and a successor following him, he was again elected. Another New Hampshire man, Henry Chamberlin, native of Pembroke, was the Democratic candidate for the office in 1874, and John J. Bagley, one of the most distinguished chief magistrates of the State, came of New Hampshire stock, his father having emigrated from Somersworth. William A. Fletcher, native of Plymouth, an able lawyer, became the first Chief Justice of the Michigan Supreme Court; while another lawyer of like ability, native of the same town, Alfred Russell, was, later, for many years a leader of the Detroit bar. Two New Hampshire born men, at least, have been Speakers of the Michigan House of Representatives—Jefferson T. Thurber, native of Unity, in 1851 and Sullivan M. Cutcheon, born in Pembroke, in 1863-4; who also served as U. S. District Attorney and Comptroller of the Treasury; while William Graves, native of South Hampton, held the office of Secretary of State. Two lawyers of distinction of New Hampshire origin, Oliver L. Spaulding, native of Jaffrey and Byron M. Cutcheon of Pembroke, were Michigan representatives in Congress, as was, also, Charles C. Comstock, a leading Grand Rapids manufacturer, born in Sullivan.

Michigan owes the organization of her splendid educational system to a son of New Hampshire, John D. Pierce, native of Chesterfield, who formulated the plan of her University—the first and greatest of the State Universities of the country—after consultation with the most progressive educators of America and Europe, and carried it through to adoption, against strenuous opposition; and right here it may be noted that the last great president of this University preceding the present incumbent, leading all other institutions of the kind in its present student enrollment, as well as the number of living alumni, was Harry B. Hutchins, a native of the town of Lisbon, who had previously served as the dean of its Law Department, after having organized a similar department for Cornell University in New York. Mr. Pierce was the first State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Michigan, and organized and put in operation the public school system of the State. It may also be said that Michigan was the first State in the Union to establish such an office, so that Mr. Pierce was, in fact, the first State Superintendent in the country. Another eminent educator who subsequently held the same office and was also principal of the famous Michigan State Normal School at Ypsilanti, was Joseph Estabrook, a native of the town of Bath.

Not only in public affairs and educational work have New Hampshire men been at the front in Michigan, but in great business and industrial enterprises as well. James F. Joy, native of Durham, a successful lawyer in Detroit, turned his attention to railroading, built the Michigan Central Railroad, of which he became president; as well as the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and other great lines promoting the development of the Central West; while Jesse H. Farwell, native of North Charlestown, and donor of the Farwell School building in that village, was the pioneer of the freighting business on the Great Lakes, conducting the bulk of the business in that line for years, at the same time, in company with his son carrying on immense operations in contract work, installing the Buffalo sewage system with its difficult outlet into the Niagara River, constructing the main section of the Croton Aqueduct, for New York City's water supply, on which 1500 men were employed over three years, and doing the earth and rock work for the U. S. government locks, at Sault St. Marie, Michigan, the largest in the world.

John Wentworth, a native of Sandwich, and a representative of one of New Hampshire's old historic families, familiarly known as "Long John" from his great height, was a pioneer lawyer in Chicago, and active in promoting the progress and development of that now wonderful city. He was one of the early mayors, served a number of years in Congress, and was also for 20 years editor of the Chicago Democrat. New Hampshire capital, brains and energy have had much indeed to do with the upbuilding and advancement of the great metropolis of the Central West, and to-day two of its greatest enterprises are conducted by New Hampshire born men. John G. Runnells, native of Effingham is president of the Pullman Company, and John G. Shedd, born in Alstead, is the head of the Marshall Field Company, doing the largest dry goods business in the world. Two New Hampshire natives have represented Chicago districts in the National Congress in recent years—the late George E. Adams, born in Keene, and Thomas Gallagher, a son of Concord; while Robert Smith, native of Peterboro, and Bradford N. Stevens of Boscawen were also once members of the Illinois Congressional delegation, and Jonas Hutchinson, native of Miiford, was long a judge of the Superior court.

Gerry W. Hazelton, native of the town of Chester was probably New Hampshire's most prominent son conspicuous in Wisconsin public life. He was a member and president of the State Senate, served two terms in Congress, and was for ten years U. S. District Attorney for Wisconsin. His brother George, later of Washington, D. C., was also at one time a Wisconsin Congressman. Another eminent Wisconsin lawyer, born in New Hampshire, is James G. Flanders, native of New London who has practiced in Milwaukee for more than fifty years with much success. A Democrat in politics, he had little opportunity for political preferment had he sought it, but he has been prominent in the councils of his party, has served it in national conventions and otherwise, and has been President of the Wisconsin Bar Association. Another New Hampshire born man, long resident in Wisconsin, attained distinction and rendered great service in another direction—Sherburne S. Merrill, native of Alexandria, who entered the service of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, as a section man in early life, through his intelligence and energy gained rapid promotion, and finally became president of the great corporation, which under his enterprising management came to control more miles of railway than any other corporation in the world. Joseph V. Quarles, some time U. S. Senator from Wisconsin, it may be mentioned, was the son of a Carroll County New Hampshire native.

Iowa's greatest statesman and most eminent citizen, James W. Grimes, Governor and United States Senator, went out from New Hampshire, a native of the town of Deering; while William G. Wood, sometime U. S. District Attorney, and Judge of the Supreme Court of that State was born in Hanover. Nathaniel B. Baker, long Adjutant General, including the Civil War period, a native of Concord, emigrated to Iowa after serving as Governor of New Hampshire.

Probably more natives of New Hampshire, now living, have made their homes in Minnesota than in any other Western State. A strong tide of emigration to that State set in, here, in the early "fifties" and continued for many years, great inducements in the line of agriculture, as well as manufacturing opportunities, being presented, and the climate there being regarded as particularly healthful. The mass of these people engaged in farming; but other lines of activity were pursued by many, the professional field by no means being neglected. A pioneer in the development of the city of Minneapolis, and in the great flour manufacturing business, in which that city leads the world, was John S. Pillsbury, a native of the town of Sutton, who became prominent in public affairs and Governor of the State. Another New Hampshire native who held the same office, was David M. Clough, native of Lyme; while the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State—Calvin L. Brown—was born in the little town of Goshen, under the shadow of Sunapee Mountain. Lyndon A. Smith, native of Boscawen, was Lieutenant Governor and for some years Attorney General of the state. Walter H. Sanborn, of the U. S. Circuit Court, long a prominent lawyer of St. Paul, has already been mentioned. He was for a time associated with his brother, Gen. John B. Sanborn, also a native of Epsom, an early settler in the state, active in public affairs, who served with distinction in the Union army in the Civil War, and was for some years Adjutant General of the state. Greenleaf Clark, native of Atkinson, served for some time as a Judge of the Superior Court. Adna D. and Anson L. Keyes, the first a native of Acworth and the second of Lempster, cousins and Dartmouth graduates of the class of 1872, were partners in a successful law practice in the city of Faribault, and prominent in legislative and other public service, and the same may be said of George E. Perley of Moorehead, also a native of the town of Lempster. In other professional lines, and in educational work New Hampshire is also prominently represented in the state.

The first governor of Dakota Territory, before its division, was Nehemiah G. Ordway, native of Warner, who before his appointment had been Sergeant-at-Arms of the National House of Representatives, and George P. Waldron, born in Farmington, was United States Attorney. In North Dakota for many years past, Clarence B. Little, a native of Pembroke, has been an upstanding figure in public affairs and banking. He is president of the National Bank of Bismark and has been a leader in the State Senate as chairman of the Judiciary Committee for a score of years or more.

The first Governor of Arkansas, under the territorial government, was Gen. James Miller of New Hampshire. Edwin O. Stannard, a native of Newport, and an extensive flour manufacturer of St. Louis, was Lieutenant Governor of Missouri, and a representative in Congress from that State, while Nathaniel Holmes, born in Peterboro, was a Justice of the Supreme Court, and Levi C. Marvin, a son of Alstead was a Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Naturally few men from the North ever came to the front in public life in the Southern States; but occasionally a son of the Granite State has secured recognition in that direction. Ira H. Evans, a native of Piermont, was at one time Speaker of the Texas House of Representatives; while several New Hampshire men have been prominent in Louisiana, where Charles A. Peabody, native of Sandwich, was Chief Justice, and Henry M. Spofford, born in Gilmananton, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Benjamin F. Flanders, native of Bristol, was Military Governor, and a Representative in Congress, which latter position was also held by George L. Smith, born in Hillsboro, and Ebenezer W. Ripley, a son of Hanover. Edward H. Durell, native of Portsmouth, was a mayor of New Orleans and a Judge of the U. S. District Court.

While many New Hampshire people have made their homes in recent years in the State of Florida, where the census of 1850 returned fifty New Hampshire born men and women among the permanent residents, and hundreds more pass the winter months in the state, not many Granite State men have come into public prominence there. One of them, however, George F. Drew, a native of the town of Alton, who was one of the most extensive lumber manufacturers in the South, took an active part in political affairs, and served as Governor, 1876 to 1880, with great efficiency, bringing the condition of the State's finances up to a high standard, from one bordering on bankruptcy. Arthur F. Odlin, a native of Concord, who had served as Attorney General of Porto Rico, and a Judge in the Philippines, settled at Arcadia, Fla., some years since and has attained high rank at the bar of the state, to which James W. Henderson of Dover was admitted forty years ago, then a resident of St. Augustine, and for a time prosecuting attorney of St. John's county, and extensively engaged in real estate operations.

Nedom L. Angier, native of Acworth, was for a time State Treasurer of Georgia; while Joseph C. Abbott, born in Concord, was a United States Senator from North Carolina, and John C. French of Gilmanton served in the House of Representatives from the same state, as did Harry Libbey, native of Wakefield, from Virginia.

While many New Hampshire men have made their home on the Pacific Coast, they have generally been more prominent in business and industrial operations than in public and political life; yet John Swett, native of Pittsfield, was the first Superintendent of Public Instruction in the State of California and laid the foundation for its splendid educational system, and was succeeded in office by another son of New Hampshire, Ira G. Hoitt, native of Lee. Frederic T. Woodman, native of Concord, was the mayor of Los Angeles, the largest city in the state in 1917-18. There are many colonies of New Hampshire people in different sections of California, notably in the south, where they are extensively engaged in fruit culture. Frank E. and Warren C. Kimball, natives of Hopkinton, who purchased a large tract of land in San Diego county, and laid out National City, some 40 years ago, also planted the largest olive orchard in the world. They also organized the Southern California R. R. Harry Chandler, native of Lisbon, is the proprietor of the Los Angeles Times, one of the greatest newspapers of the Pacific Coast and has extensive interests in other directions. Dartmouth College conferred upon him the honorary degree of A. M. at the last commencement. Robert Judkins, native of Laconia, who went to California in the employ of E. H. Rollins & Sons, bankers, who had a branch establishment in San Francisco, is now president of the First National Bank of Long Beach, while Edward N. Pearson, Jr., native of Concord, who went there in a similar capacity, is now the head of a large private banking concern in San Francisco and extensively engaged in promoting irrigation enterprises.

Many New Hampshire people have settled in the new State of Washington, whose first territorial governor was Alvin Flanders, a native of the town of Bristol, who also served as its delegate in Congress. The city of Spokane has been built up, largely by New Hampshire capital and enterprise, the late Daniel C. Corbin, a native of the town of Newport, having contributed more to its growth and prosperity, and the development of the surrounding country than any other man, through the projection and construction of numerous railway systems centering in that city, and the promotion of other great enterprises. George B. Lane, a native of Epping, was for some time Mayor of the city of Olympia.

Charles F. Caswell, native of Strafford, was for some years a Justice of the Superior Court of Colorado.

But it is impracticable to particularize farther in this direction. There is scarcely a state in the Union where New Hampshire men have not been leaders in public, as well as in professional, business and industrial life.

The Dominion of Canada, even, has drawn to no little extent upon New Hampshire for men in public affairs as well as in private enterprise, notable examples in the former line, being John F. Sanborn, native of Gilmanton, member of Parliament and a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, and Sir George Halsey Perley, born in Lebanon, who has not only been a member of Parliament, but served as High Commissioner for the Canadian government in London during the World War.

Especially prominent have sons of New Hampshire been in the Christian ministry. A large octavo volume, entitled "The Native Ministry of New Hampshire" compiled by the late Rev. Nathan H. Carter of Concord, contains the record of 2,500 clergymen, born in this state, to which several hundred more might now be added, since this book was published a dozen years ago. Of these over 200 had received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. A most remarkable record, which probably cannot be paralleled anywhere in the world is that of the Foster family of Hanover, seven brothers, sons of Richard Foster, all having been prominent ministers—three of them Doctors of Divinity.

There have been leading representatives of nearly all denominations among New Hampshire's native Ministry, but comparatively few of whom can be mentioned, by way of illustration. Congregationalism, long time known as the "Standing order," and practically the state religion, until within a century past, from the fact that all were taxed for its support, has naturally had more adherents in the State in the past than any other branch of the church, and its native born clergy have been most numerous. Among them may be named Henry Wood, native of Loudon, many years Chaplain in the U. S. Navy, who established the first Protestant Mission in Japan and preached the first sermon in English in that country; Samuel J. Spaulding, born in Lyndeboro, for 33 years pastor of the Whitefield church, Newburyport, Mass.; Edward L. Clark, native of Nashua, for 20 years pastor of the Church of the Puritans in New York, later of the Central Church, Boston; Samuel Swain, native of Concord, pastor Central Church, Providence, R I.; Alonzo H. Quint, born in Dover, pastor of various churches, last and best, chairman of the Committee which called the convention to form the National Council, and later Moderator of the Council; Arthur Little, Webster, pastor in Fon Du Lac, Wis., Chicago, Ill., and Boston, Mass.; Henry Little of the same town, who held pastorates in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky, and is credited with having organized more churches and Sunday Schools than any other man; Charles H. Richards of Plainfield, pastor First Church in Madison, Wis., 23 years and of Central Church, Philadelphia, 13 years; Ephraim Peabody of Wilton, long preacher at King's Chapel, Boston; David L. Furber, Sandwich for 35 years pastor at Newton Center, Mass.; Willard L. Gage, of Loudon, long time pastor of Pearl St. Church, Hartford, Conn.; and many of more recent time including, among others, such talented sons of Manchester as Dr. Newton M. Hall of the old North Church, Springfield, Mass.; and Allen Eastman Cross, at one time Assistant pastor of the Old South Church, Boston, and later pastor at Milford, Mass.

The Episcopalians, with whom the earliest settlers of the State were numbered, so far as they had any religious affiliation, but who were overshadowed by the Congregationalists under Massachusetts ascendancy, have been ably represented in the ministry by such men as Samuel Parker, native of Portsmouth, ordained in England by the Lord Bishop of London, who was the rector of Trinity church from 1774 to 1804, was the only clergyman remaining at his post in Boston during the Revolution and was for some time Bishop of the Eastern District; Asa Eaton, native of Plaistow, for 25 years rector of Christ Church, Boston, who established the first Sunday School in that city; Charles B.

Dana, native of Orford, rector Christ Church, Alexandria, Va. (George Washington's old church) for 26 years, later at Trinity Church, Natchez, Miss.; and Charles Mason, native of Portsmouth, for 15 years rector of Grace Church, Boston; Philander Chase, native of Cornish, eminent in the service of the Episcopal church in the Central West, both in the establishment of churches and educational institutions. He was the first Bishop of Ohio, and afterward of Illinois, while Carlton Chase, native of Claremont, was the first Bishop of this diocese, serving for many years. William B. Howe, also of Claremont, was the sixth Episcopal Bishop of South Carolina, and Walter T. Sumner, a son of Manchester, is now the Bishop of Oregon.

Among eminent representatives of the Baptist faith, New Hampshire born, may be named Baron Stow, native of Croydon, for 35 years the leading Baptist preacher in Boston, where Adoniram J. Gordon, of New Hampton birth, also served with distinction for a quarter of a century. Francis R. Morse, native of Salisbury, was in the same ministry in Albany, Brooklyn, and New York City for a long period, his last and most important pastorate being with Calvary Church, New York and covering a period of 14 years. Moses H. Bixby, native of Warren, after ten years of missionary work in Burmah, was for 32 years pastor of the Cranston St., Baptist Church in Providence, R. I.

New Hampshire has made large contribution to Methodism, both as regards its preaching service and its educational work. One of the most noted exponents of that faith and a pioneer preacher of great ability, was John Brodhead of Newmarket, who also sat four years, from 1829 to 1833, in the National House of Representatives from this State, as did also James Pike another Methodist clergyman, who married his daughter, for a similar term, commencing in 1855. Mrs. Pike, by the way, lived to be 106 years of age, dying on the 15th day of May last. Jared Perkins of Winchester, another able minister of the same faith, also served a term in Congress. The most eminent contribution to Methodism which the State has furnished was undoubtedly in the person of the distinguished Bishop, Osman C. Baker, native of the town of Marlow, who, after serving as Principal of Newbury, Vt., Seminary, as pastor in Rochester and Manchester, as Presiding Elder of the Dover District, as a professor in the Methodist Biblical Institute in Concord and, later, as President of that Institution, was created a Bishop in 1852, serving with distinction for 19 years in that capacity, till his death in 1871. In his honor Baker University at Baldwin, Kansas, was named. Here it may be said that the Methodist Biblical Institute at Concord, which occupied the famous old North Church edifice, on the site of the present Walker School in that city, was removed to Boston in 1852 and was the basis upon which Boston University, the greatest Methodist educational institution in the country was established.

Among numerous other Methodist preachers of notable service, from this state, may be named John A. M. Chapman, native of Greenland, who preached in Boston, New York and Philadelphia; Laban Clark, born in Haverhill, long prominent in the service in Connecticut, and presiding elder in several districts; Carlos Gould, native of Newport, pioneer preacher in Western New York and a presiding elder in the Genessee Conference; John H. Twombly, native of Rochester, who served in and around Boston, was chaplain of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and an overseer of Harvard College; John L. Dearborn, born in Thornton who did great missionary and educational work in Kansas, for thirty years; Lorenzo R. Thayer, native of Winchester, preacher in many large parishes in the Boston district; Calvin Holman, native of Hopkinton, eminent in this State and in Kansas; George J. Judkins, native of Kingston, and Willis P. Odell, born in Lakeport, well known throughout New England.

Universalism is indebted to New Hampshire for many of its earliest, ablest and most distinguished preachers. Here in the town of Richmond, was born Hosea Ballou, one of the first disciples of John Murray and the first strong champion of the faith in New England, preacher in Lowell and Boston from 1807 till 1852; who was followed as pastor of the School St. Church in Boston, by Alonzo A. Miner, native of Lempster, long the ablest of Boston preachers, president of Tufts College for many years, overseer of Harvard and preacher of the last "election sermon" ever given before the Massachusetts legislature. Willard Spaulding, born in the same town with Dr. Miner, preached with great acceptance for 40 years, in different Massachusetts parishes. Sullivan H. McColles-ter, native of Marlboro, was not only an able preacher, but distinguished educator as well as a traveler and author. John G. Adams, born in Portsmouth, held important pastorates in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Ohio, and was the author of various doctrinal works. He was the father of the distinguished Dr. John Coleman Adams, of Hartford, Conn., one of the ablest preachers of the present day, who died recently. Henry I. Cushman, native of Orford was for 30 years pastor of the First Universalist Church of Providence, R. I. Enoch Morrill Pingree, native of Littleton, carried the Universalist gospel into the West and South, preaching many years in Cincinnati, O., and Louisville, Ky. Charles H. Leonard, born in Northwood, was for 23 years pastor in Chelsea, Mass., where he instituted "Children's Sunday" in the Church, since adopted in nearly all churches throughout the country. He was for 30 years dean of the Crane Divinity School at Tufts College, in which position he was succeeded by Lee S. McCollester, native of Westmoreland, who had served many years as pastor of the Universalist Church at Detroit, Mich., following a pastorate at Claremont in this State. Cyrus H. Fay, native of Lebanon, after an eleven years pastorate in the First Church at Providence, in which he was succeeded by Dr. Cushman, was for 24 years a pastor in Brooklyn, N. Y. Harold Marshall, native of Kingston, an able preacher, is now editor of the Universalist Leader at Boston.

Unitarianism, which came to the front, shortly after Universalism got a foothold in the country, each being an organized protest against the Calvinistic doctrines of the Congregational and other "orthodox" churches, so called, has, like Universalism, a more limited following in the State than other denominations, previously mentioned, and New Hampshire has not furnished so many distinguished preachers of this faith as it has of the Universalist, but the one man, whose name stands out most conspicuously among the leaders of the denomination—James Freeman Clarke—for 47 years pastor of the Church of the Disciples in Boston, was born in Hanover, N. H., while his successor in that pastorate, Charles G. Ames, though born in Massachusetts, was reared in the town of Canterbury, and was to all intents and purposes, a New Hampshire man. Other Unitarian preachers of more or less eminence, natives of the State, include William B. O. Peabody, born in Exeter, for 27 years pastor in Springfield, Mass.; Nathaniel Thayer, native of Hampton, pastor at Lancaster, Mass. for 45 years; George W. Burnap, born in Merrimack, long time pastor of the First Independent Church of Baltimore, Md.; John Clark, native of Portsmouth, for twenty years pastor of the First Church in Boston, in which he was succeeded by Edward Cummings, the present distinguished pastor, who is a native of Colebrook. Samuel C. Beane, native of Candia and Josiah L. Steward born in Sullivan, both attained distinction as preachers in this state and Massachusetts; and William Safford Jones, native of Exeter, has recently ended a brilliant pastorate in the Channing Memorial Church, Newport, R. I., to accept a call to the Unitarian church in Portsmouth.

Presbyterianism, which is not essentially different from Congregationalism, so far as matters of faith are concerned, has had small hold in New Hampshire, and few churches of that denomination are found in the State; but among its distinguished representatives have been John Chase Lord, native of the town of Washington, nearly 40 years pastor of the Central church in Buffalo, N Y., and Thomas Marshall, born in Weare, who filled pastorates in Minnesota, Missouri and Illinois, and was for thirteen years Secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions.

Benjamin Randall, the founder of the Free Will Baptist Church (now united with the Baptists), was a native of the town of Newcastle, later removing to New Durham, and had a personal following probably larger than any other religious leader in the state. Joseph Badger, native of Gilmanton, was the founder of the denomination specifically known as "Christian," which has a very considerable membership in some parts of the country, whose largest church in the state is at Franklin, and one of whose ablest preachers was the late Alvah H. Morrill, native of Danbury.

While the Roman Catholic Church has to-day more adherents in the State than has any Protestant denomination, and many native sons of New Hampshire have undoubtedly rendered efficient service in its priesthood, the two whose names stand out conspicuously are those of George A. Guertin, Bishop of Manchester, native of Nashua and Thomas M. O'Leary, native of Dover, recently consecrated Bishop of Springfield.

The Medical profession in the country at large has also had large contribution from the little State of New Hampshire, mention of a few only of prominent representatives, in addition to those already named as Boston practitioners, can be made here. Aside from such eminent members of the Dartmouth Medical faculty, as Drs. Dixi Crosby and Carlton P. Frost, with others scarcely less eminent, such distinguished practitioners as Dr. Willard Parker, native of Hillsboro, a leader of his profession in the city of New York, Professor of Surgery in the N. Y. College of Physicians and Surgeons, in whose honor the Willard Parker Hospital for Contagious Diseases was named, and Dr. Reuben D. Mussey, native of Pelham, professor of Surgery in the Ohio Medical College, and lecturer in many other colleges, who is credited with being the first to successfully tie both carotid arteries, should have first mention. Others of note include Dr. Thomas R. Crosby, native of Sandwich, in charge of the Columbian College hospital during the Civil War; Dr. Lyman Spaulding, native of Cornish, president of Western N. Y. College of Physicians and Surgeons; Dr. James F. Dana, born in Amherst, professor of Chemistry in New York College of Physicians and Surgeons; Dr. Charles E. Quimby, native of New Ipswich, for 30 years professor of Medical practice in the University of New York; Dr. Jesse Smith, native of Peterboro, long professor of Anatomy in Cincinnati Medical College; Dr. Jabez B. Upham, born in Claremont, physician to Boston City Hospital, also a noted patron of music, who secured for Boston the great organ in Music Hall; Dr. Edwin B. Harvey, born in Deerfield, originator and Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Registration in Medicine and father of the measure providing free textbooks in the schools of that State; Dr. William B. Hills, native of Plaistow, professor of Chemistry in Harvard Medical School; Dr. Gilman Kimball, born in Hill, eminent practitioner in Lowell for many years, and professor of Surgery in Berkshire Medical Institute; Dr. Luther I. Bell, native of Chester, expert alienist and superintendent McLean Hospital, Somerville, Mass.; Dr. George H. Whipple, born in Ashland, professor of Medical Research, and Dr. Henry G. Branierd, native of Londonderry, professor of Nervous and Mental Diseases in the University of California; Dr. Uranus O. B. Wingate, native of Rochester, professor in the Wisconsin College of Physicians and Surgeons, and Secretary of the Wisconsin Board of Health; Dr. William W. Watkins, native of Warner, prominent in practice in St. Louis, and later founder and first president of the Idaho Medical Society, and Dr. W. H. H. Pollard, born in Brentwood, professor of Hygiene and Physical Education, in Washington-Lee University, Va.

In dentistry, as in medicine, with which it is closely allied, New Hampshire men have been active and efficient, all over the country, and in goodly numbers. It is needless to designate individual examples, but a conspicuous illustration is furnished in the fact that out of a single school district in the little town of Lempster, went three men who became prominent in this profession. Ozias M. George was for forty years in successful practice at Bel lows Falls, Vt., with a wide reputation for skill in his profession; Levi C. Taylor, for some years located at Holyoke, Mass., but later, for many years, in practice in Hartford, Conn., gained high rank. He was the first president of the Hartford Dental Association, was also president of the Connecticut Valley Dental Association, and for some time lecturer on Oral Prophylaxis and Orthodontia in the N. Y. College of Dental and Oral Surgery; while Charles A. Brackett, who has been an instructor and professor in the Harvard Dental School for 48 years, the last 32 years as professor of Dental Pathology, in practice in Newport, R. I., since 1873, has a reputation in the profession second to that of no man in the country.

Most New Hampshire born lawyers of prominence in other states, have already been mentioned in connection with various important public offices which they have held, or as members of the bar in Boston. Among those who have been in successful practice in New York, not heretofore mentioned, are Henry Howland, native of Walpole; Nathaniel Holmes Clement, native of Tilton; Albert E. Hadlock, native of Amherst; George W. Burleigh and Daniel G. Rollins, natives of Somersworth; Philip Carpenter, native of Bath; William D. Sawyer, native of Dover; Henry Cole Quimby, native of Lakeport; and Harry D. Nims, native of Keene. Benjamin F. Ayer, native of Kingston, after practice in this state, had a most successful career at the Chicago bar. Among the most important contributions to legal science and learning has been the service in the Dane Law School at Harvard, of Joel Parker, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of N. H., and Jeremiah Smith, Associate Justice, each for an extended term, and of Nathaniel Holmes, native of Peterboro, as Royal Professor of Law, and of Christopher C. Langdell, a native of New Boston, long time dean of the School, for whom Landell Hall, the main law building was named.

No other state in the Union has contributed as extensively as has New Hampshire to the educational life of the nation. Dartmouth College ranks with Harvard, Yale and Princeton in potent influence for good, upon the national character; while the State College, comparatively young as it is, has been sending out young men, for years, who are taking high rank in the scientific world. It would be impracticable to attempt to name here, all the sons of New Hampshire who have been presidents of colleges and universities throughout the country, or held important positions in their faculties. A few must suffice for the present purpose. Joseph McKeen, native of Londonderry, was the first President of Bowdoin College, in which position Jesse Appleton, born in New Ipswich, was later conspicuous. Oren B. Cheney, native of Holderness, was the founder and first president of Bates. Benjamin Larabee, native of Charlestown was long president of Middlebury. Alonzo A. Miner, native of Lempster, was for some time president of Tufts College, in which Heman A. Dearborn, native of Weare, was for 33 years professor of Latin; while Homer T. Fuller, also of Lempster, was long president of Drury College, Mo., after serving as president of Worcester Polytechnic Institute. Jonathan P. Cushing, native of Rochester, was for 14 years president of Hampden-Sidney College, Va., while Hosea H. Smith, native of Deerfield, was president of Catawba College, N. C., later professor of Modern Languages in the University of North Carolina, ultimately removing to Texas, where he organized the public school system of the city of Houston, and served as president of the Sam Houston Normal College at Huntsville. Samuel C. Derby, native of Dublin, was president of Antioch College, Ohio, and later Dean of the College of Arts, Philosophy and Science in Ohio State University. Samuel L. Fellows, native of Sandwich, was president of Cornell College, Ia., and Joseph G. Hoyt, born in Dunbarton, Dean of Washington University, St. Louis, Mo. Horace M. Hale, native of Hollis, was president of the University of Colorado, and Edward P. Tenney native of Concord, served in Colorado College in similar capacity. Arthur L. Perry, native of Lyme, long professor of Political Economy in Amherst College, was the country's ablest writer on that subject. Ernest Albee, native of Langdon, has been professor of Philosophy in Cornell University since 1907; Marshall S. Brown, native of Keene is professor of History and Political Science in the University of New York, and Charles A. F. Currier, born in East Kingston, holds a similar position in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Kendrick Metcalf, native of Newport was for 40 years professor of Latin in Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., and for a time acting president. Natt M. Emery, native of Pembroke, has been for some years vice-president of Lehigh University, and is now acting president. John W. Beede, born in Raymond, is professor of Geology in the University of Texas, and Amos N. Currier, native of Canaan, is Dean of the College of Liberal Arts in the University of Iowa. Myron W. Adams, native of Gilsum and summer resident of Swanzey, is Dean of Atlanta University, and Clinton H. Moore, born in Piermont, was the founder and first president of Montana College. Winthrop E. Stone, native of Chesterfield, was for twenty years president of Purdue University, Ind., preceeding his accidental death in the spring of 1921, through falling from a cliff in the Canadian Rockies, and it may be stated in this connection, that his brother, Herbert F. Stone, is now Dean of Law in Columbia University. Harry B. Hutchins, native of Lisbon, who organized the Law Department of Cornell University, and was subsequently for some years Dean of the Michigan University Law Department, was, later, for a dozen years president of that University, the oldest, largest, and most influential of all the State Universities in the Union, to whose chair of Economics, by the way, Edmund E. Day, native of Manchester, has recently been called from a similar position at Harvard.

But it is not alone as presidents and faculty members in the Colleges and Universities of the country, that New Hampshire natives have done great work for the cause of education. More largely has their work been done as superintendents and teachers of the public schools, thousands of them having served efficiently in the latter capacity, all over the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast; while New Hampshire born superintendents have made a record of success surpassed by those from no other state. The great work of Superintendent John Swett of Pittsfield, in organizing the public school system of California, as its first State Superintendent, has been referred to in speaking of New Hampshire men in that state. Another man, no less distinguished in the same line, was John D. Philbrick, native of Deerfield, for some years State Superintendent in Connecticut, and later superintendent of the Boston public schools. Samuel T. Dutton, native of Hillsboro, who has since served for years as Professor of School Administration in the Teachers' College of Columbia University, gained his reputation as a successful educator as superintendent of schools in New Haven, Conn., and Brookline, Mass., while Frank E. Spaulding, native of Dublin, now head of the Yale University School of Pedagogy, had previously made a brilliant record as superintendent of schools in Newton, Mass., Minneapolis, Minn., and Cleveland, Ohio. John B. Peaslee, native of Plaistow, was for sometime superintendent of the public schools of Cincinnati, Ohio, and it was while acting in that capacity he inaugurated the annual tree planting observance which has resulted in the establishment of "Arbor Day" throughout the country. It was noted, some years since, that out of the nine State Normal Schools then existing in Massachusetts no less than seven had New Hampshire men at the head, as principals, and it is safe to say that there is no city or considerable town in that state, that has not had a New Hampshire native as its superintendent of schools, at some time or other. In addition to those already mentioned as serving in that capacity, the names of Homer P. Lewis, native of Claremont, who had previously served many years as principal of the Omaha, Neb., high school, who was for fifteen years superintendent of the schools of Worcester, and of Joseph G. Edgerly, native of Barnstead, who held the record of forty years service in a similar capacity in Fitchburg, should not be omitted.

Samuel R. Hall, native of Croydon, who was subsequently one of the founders of the American Institute of Instruction, has the credit of having established the first teacher's training school in the United States, located in the little town of Concord, Vt., and also having been the first person to use the blackboard in the school room. Frank Arthur Metcalf, native of Acworth, has been for many years the head of the Home Correspondence School, of Springfield, Mass., with an enrollment of students, throughout the world, exceeding that of Harvard University. In this connection it may be well to remark, finally, that when the United State Bureau of Education was established, and President Grant looked about for the proper man to place at its head as Commissioner, after careful survey he selected Gen. John Eaton, native of Sutton, already distinguished as an educator as well as soldier, to fill that important position, which he did, most acceptably for years.

In its contribution to journalism, as well as education, New Hampshire may well claim first rank. The premier in the editorial field, after Benjamin Franklin himself, was Horace Greeley, native of Amherst, who made the New York Tribune for years the greatest political power in America. Hardly less able and influential was Charles A. Dana, of the Sun, native of the town of Hinsdale. Jonas M. Bundy, native of Columbia, was for many years the able editor of the New York Evening Mail. Horace White, born in Colebrook, after long service on the Chicago Tribune, became more eminent as editor of the New York Evening Post, and The Nation. Charles G. Greene, native of Boscawen, founded and long edited the Boston Post, which under his direction, was for years the ablest organ of Democratic opinion in New England. In more recent years Charles R. Miller native of Hanover, had a notable editorial career in New York City, where he long had been editor of the Times. All over the country, indeed, New Hampshire men have been engaged in the newspaper field, but it is impracticable to particularize to any great extent. Nathaniel H. Carter, native of Concord, was for many years editor of the Albany Register and the New York Statesman. Charles L. McArthur, born in Claremont, established the Milwaukee, Wis., Sentinel, and was afterward, for many years, editor of the Troy, N. Y. Budget, and Daily Whig.

John S. C. Knowlton, born in Hopkinton, was for 40 years editor of the Worcester, Mass., Palladium, while John H. Fahey, native of Manchester, who has recently purchased the Mirror of that city, has been for some years owner and publisher of the Worcester Post. George A. Marden, native of Mount Vernon, was long editor of the Lowell, Mass., Courier. William B. Miller, native of Salisbury, has been managing editor of both the New York World and American; while Harry Chandler, born in Lisbon, is now the publisher of the Los Angeles, Cal., Times, the greatest newspaper on the Pacific coast.

In the various other fields of effort and achievement, in which New Hampshire men have been conspicuous, a few notable examples, only, can be mentioned here by way of illustration. Among authors and writers of note may be named Benjamin B. Kimball, native of Lebanon; Joseph E. Worcester, the famous lexicographer, native of Bedford; Thomas Bailey Aldrich and Benjamin P. Shallaber, (Mrs. Partington) of Portsmouth; Orison S. Marden, native of Thornton, founder and editor of "Success" and author of many books; Justin H. Smith, native of Boscawen, voluminous historical writer; Charles Carleton Coffin, also Boscawen born, noted author and war correspondent; Thomas W. Knox, native of Pembroke, noted traveler and writer of boys' books; Samuel Walter Foss, the poetical peer of James Whitcomb Riley, native of Candia, and Ralph A. Cram, native of Hampton Falls, well known as a writer of books, but more noted as an architect, whose most conspicuous work in the latter line was the great cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York. In this connection may be named such New Hampshire born publishers as William D. Ticknor, native of Lebanon, and James T. Fields, of Portsmouth, of the noted firm of Ticknor and Fields, and Daniel Lothrop, born in Rochester, of D. Lothrop & Co. In library work no state has had more prominent or efficient representatives, as shown by the accomplishments of such men as Ainsworth R. Spofford, native of Gilmanton, long in charge of the Library of Congress at Washington, in the structure of whose splendid building, by the way, Concord granite is the main material, and the assistant librarian of the same institution, Appleton P. C. Griffin, native of Wilton; George H. Moore, native of Concord, superintendent of the Lenox Library, New York City, and Frank Pierce Hill, also of Concord, librarian of the Brooklyn, N. Y., public library, some time president of the American Library Association, and Chairman of its War Finance committee during the World War.

In science and invention New Hampshire men have been among the leaders. In astronomy, Charles A. Young, native of Hanover, professor at Dartmouth and Princeton, discoverer of the spectrum of the corona, author of "The Sun" in the International Scientific Series, and of a text book of General Astronomy; John R. Eastman, born in Andover, for 36 years astronomer at the U. S. Naval Observatory at Washington, and first president of the Washington Academy of Science, and Solon I. Bailey, native of Lisbon, long connected with the Harvard observatory at Cambridge, and in charge of the Harvard astronomical station at Arequipa, Peru.

Moses G. Farmer, native of Boscawen, was the pioneer in the development of electrical science, and laid the foundation for electrical engineering. He lighted his own house with incandescant lamps, more than sixty years ago. He it was who devised the fire alarm telegraph system, and installed in Boston the first in the country. He was long professor of Electrical Science at the U. S. Naval Station in Newport, R. I. George B. Prescott, native of Kingston, who was associated with Edison, invented the pneumatic tube. Thaddeus S. C. Lowe, born in Jefferson, was a pioneer in aeronautics, and along various other lines of discovery and invention. He was the first to produce artificial ice, and invented the water gas machine which revolutionized the gas industry in the country. Isaac Adams, native of Sandwich, inventor of the power press, and Robert P. Parrott, born in Lee, who produced the first rifled cannon, originated powerful agencies, the one for peace and the other in war, while Walter A. Wood, native of Mason, the mowing machine inventor, made notable contribution to agricultural industry. Sylvester Marsh, native of Campton, invented the dried meat process, as well as the cog wheel inclined railway system, and built the railroad onto Mt. Washington. George D. Burton, native of Temple, inventor of the Burton Stock Car, has been granted more patents for different inventions than any other man—over 500 in number, while Nehemiah S. Bean, native of Gilmanton, built the first steam fire engine ever produced.

In Art as well as Science, New Hampshire men have won notable distinction. As sculptors, Larkin D. Mead, native of Chesterfield and Daniel Chester French, born in Exeter, have place in the front rank, while Benjamin Champney, native of New Ipswich, has not been surpassed as a landscape painter. Other painters of note born in the State, include John S. R. Tilton and Frank French, natives of Loudon, Roswell H. Shurtleff of Rindge, Alfred C. Howland of Walpole, Adna and Ulysses D. Tenney of Hanover, and Daniel C. Strain of Littleton, the latter three eminent in portraiture, whose work largely adorns the interior walls of the State House in Concord.

In banking and finance the sons of New Hampshire have held and still hold, no inferior position. Her representatives in this line, in Boston, have been referred to in speaking of the state's contribution to that city. They have been no less conspicuous in New York, where Ruel W. Poor, native of New London, has long been president of the Garfield National Bank, while Harvy D. Gibson, born in Conway, was for sometime president of the Liberty National Bank, and during the World War administered the financial affairs of the American Red Cross. It is worthy of note that the first charter granted under the national banking act was that of the National Bank of Davenport, Ia., of which Austin Corbin, native of Newport, was president. Mr. Corbin, by the way, later removed to New York City, where he established the Corbin Banking Co. He also engaged extensively in railroading. He built the Manhattan Beach and the Long Island railroads, and had other great enterprises in hand when he met an accidental death, at his old home in Newport, near which he had established the Blue Mountain Park, the largest private park in America. Referring to railroading, it is proper to say that in this line New Hampshire men have been prominent. James F. Joy and Sherburne S. Merrill, conspicuous examples, were mentioned in connection with New Hampshire men in Michigan and Wisconsin, and Daniel C. Corbin, brother of Austin, when speaking of the State of Washington. Another example is furnished in Andrew Pierce of Dover, who built the Texas Pacific Railroad, and still another in Charles P. Clark, born in Nashua, long president of the New York, New Haven and Hartford road, who was succeeded by Charles S. Mellen, who, though not born in New Hampshire, was reared and educated in Concord, and there commenced his railroad career, which included, for a time, the presidency of the great Northern Pacific; and who since his retirement from active life, has established his permanent residence in the Capital City.

In the musical world New Hampshire has not been without substantial representation. The famous Hutchinson Family, singers of national repute, with John W. Hutchinson of Milford at their head, and Walter Kittredge of Merrimack, author of "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground," a famous singer of Civil War days were most popular in their day. Henry C. Barnabee of Portsmouth, gained fame in comic opera. John W. Conant, native of Nashua, was director of music in the National Cathedral School at Washington. Samuel W. Cole, born in Meriden, long a teacher in New England Conservatory, and supervisor of music in the schools in and around Boston, gained wide reputation as an instructor and director. Harry Brooks Day, native of Newmarket, was for 20 years organist at St. Paul's Cathedral, New York, and was a composer of note. Burton T. Scales, native of Dover, was many years director of music in the William Penn Charter School for Boys, Philadelphia, and later at Girard College, in the same city. George W. Keenan, born in Penacook, is professor of the violin in the Kansas State Teachers' College. Henri

CHARLES A. BRACKETT, D. M. D.

G. Blaisdell, native of Canaan, won a wide reputation as a violinist, and conductor, and has a notable successor in the latter line in Nelson P. Coffin, native of Newport. In this connection, as well as anywhere, it may properly be remarked, that Jonas Chickering, the noted piano manufacturer, was a native of the town of New Ipswich.

The theatrical, as well as the musical world has received no inconsiderable contribution from New Hampshire talent, as evidenced by the career of Denman Thompson, native of Swanzey, creator and producer of "The Old Homestead," and Will M. Cressy, native of Bradford, playwright and actor, now and for many years, among the most popular comedians in the country, and throughout the world. Charles H. Hoyt, native of Charlestown, playwright and manager, long had a national reputation, and Lawrence Grattan (Gahagan), born in Penacook, is in the midst of a successful career as playwright and actor.

Henry Wells, Benjamin P. Cheney and Nathaniel White, all New Hampshire natives, were pioneers in the express business in which Charles W. Robie, native of New Hampton, is now prominent as the New England manager of the American Railway Express.

Carroll D. Wright, native of Dunbarton, lawyer, soldier and educator (president of Clark College at the time of his death) became famous as the world's greatest statistician. Marshall P. Wilder, native of Rindge, founded the N. E. Horticultural Society and the American Pomological Society. William Ladd, native of Exeter, founded the American Peace Society. Fred Roy Martin, born in Stratford is the General Manager of the Associated Press.

It is needless, further, to mention names to establish New Hampshire's primacy in the sphere of national accomplishment, which is strikingly illustrated in the great painting of "Lincoln at Gettysburg," which hangs in the hall of the Malden, Mass., public library. Here the great Civil War President is shown in the delivery of that brief but immortal address, which he had hastily scribbled upon a scrap of paper on his way to the scene of the historic occasion, and which is now a classic wherever the English language is spoken; while no one recalls a word of the address of the orator of the day—Edward Everett of Massachusetts; while around him on the platform are grouped twenty of the nation's most illustrious leaders in civil and military life, five of whom, or one fourth of the entire number, had their birth in the little state of New Hampshire, which is represented to-day in the country at large, outside her own limits, by as many sons and daughters as remain therein, of whom over 69,000 have their homes in Massachusetts, and the balance are scattered all over the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific, more than 5,000 residing in California alone.

And now a few words in special reference to "New Hampshire's Daughters," which name, by the way, has been taken by the organization of loyal women, which alone honors and maintains the traditions of the Granite State in the New England metropolis. Time was when the Sons of New Hampshire, twelve hundred strong, gathered in Boston, with Daniel Webster at their head, to do honor to their native state. That was in in 1849, and for some years later an organization was maintained; but for sometime past the "Daughters," alone, have "held the fort." May they long continue this manifestation of their loyalty and devotion.

While it has been impossible in the past for woman to compete with man in the public service, and it has been only in recent years that the professions have been open to her, the women of New Hampshire, at home and abroad, have not failed to leave their impress for good upon the national life and character. The "Yankee School ma-am" has been recognized for generations as a dominating force in the American educational world, and New Hampshire's contribution to this great force has been surpassed by that of no other State. In the "little red" schoolhouse, all over the East, and in the log schoolhouses of the West in pioneer days, the daughters of the Granite State have directed the minds of children and youth in learning's ways, and laid the foundation for many a brilliant and successful career. Nor has their work been confined to elementary instruction. They have been prominent in the domain of higher education. Helen Peabody, native of Newport, was for forty years president of the first distinctive woman's college in the country—Western College of Oxford. When Wellesley, the first woman's college in New England, was founded by Henry F. Durant (native of Lebanon, N. H.) and Miss Peabody was invited to become its president but felt obliged to decline the call, another New Hampshire woman, Ada C. Howard, born in Temple, was finally called to the position and long and nobly performed its duties. Both Miss Peabody and Miss Howard were graduates of the famous Mount Holyoke Seminary, which later itself became a college, where many another New Hampshire woman was educated, and of which Julia E. Ward, native of Plymouth, was principal for many years, after the death of Mary Lyon, the famous founder. To-day Mary Mills Patrick, native of Canterbury, is president of the American College for Girls at Constantinople, Turkey, in which position she has done a great work for more than thirty years. Lydia Fowler Wadleigh, born in the town of Sutton, served conspicuously in the city of New York, where she was for many years principal of the girl's high school, and founded the New York Normal College for Girls. The first woman superintendent of city schools in the country was Mrs. Luella M. Wilson, (born Little) native of the town of Lyman, for some time a teacher in Littleton, later removing to Iowa, where, in 1884, she became superintendent of schools in Des Moines, the capital city of the state, serving for some years and later conducting a private school for girls in Chicago.

But the daughters of New Hampshire have wrought ably and well along other lines than education. In literature they have been, indeed, conspicuous. Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, born in Buell, in the town of Newport, was a well known writer of both prose and poetry, but was best known as the editor of "Godey's Lady's Book," the first woman's magazine in the country, which position she held for nearly forty years. It was through her efforts that Thanksgiving Day became a national holiday, her persistent appeals moving President Grant to issue the first proclamation to that effect. Other writers of note, and world-wide fame, among New Hampshire born women, are Edna Dean Proctor, our female poet laureate, born in Henniker 93 years ago, still living and as ardent a lover as ever of the mountains, lakes and rivers of her native state whose beauties she has sung in immortal verse; and Celia Leighton Thaxter, "sweet singer of the sea," born in Portsmouth, living, writing and dying on Appledore, Isle of Shoals. Other talented writers of wide repute, who were born in New Hampshire, include Constance Fennimore Woolson, native of Claremont; Mrs. Annie D. Robinson ("Marion Douglas"), (born Green), native of Plymouth; Kate Sanborn, native of Hanover; Alice Brown, born in Hampton Falls; Mary Farley Sanborn, born in Concord, and Eleanor Hodgman Porter, native of Littleton.

In the musical world many New Hampshire women have been prominent. Marion McGregor, native of Newport, was for 20 years organist at Broadway Tabernacle, New York City. Martha Dana Shepard, born in New Hampton, was long known throughout New England as an accomplished pianist and festival accompanist. Laura Wentworth Fowler, native of Somersworth, was a successful teacher of music in Lagrange Female College, Tenn., Monticello Seminary, Ill., and Elmira College, N. Y., and was also a talented writer. Ellen Beal Morey, native of Orford, who studied pianoforte, organ and theory at Leipsic and Berlin for some time, after several years in Boston, on her return organized a chorus and orchestra, which she herself conducted, being the first woman in America to wield a conductor's baton. Mrs. H. M. Smith and Emilie Grant Wilkinson, both of Nashua, were well known festival soloists for many years; while Amy Marcy Cheney (Mrs. H. H. A. Beach), born in Henniker, has won national fame as a composer, as well as a pianist. And now the most popular among the rising stars in the American musical firmament, as a vocalist, is Edith Bennett, born in New Hampshire's capital city.

In missionary work New Hampshire women have been at the front in all parts of the world, as is shown in the devoted service of Melinda Rankin of Littleton, in Mexico, of Malvina Chapin Rowell of Newport in the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii), of Mary L. Danforth of Colebrook in Japan, and Mabel Hartford of Dover in China.

Elizabeth Gardner Borgereau, native of Exeter, attained celebrity in Paris for notable work as an artist, and some of her productions are now cherished in her native town. Alice Palmer, born in Orford, established a reputation in the same line in Boston, where she had a studio for many years.

Even in professional life, especially in medicine, native New Hampshire women have come to the front, to a considerable extent, comparatively brief as has been the period during which the field has been open. Martha J. Flanders, native of Concord, was among the pioneer women in the field of medical practice, commencing in Concord in 1861 and continuing with great success in Lynn, Mass., for many years. Dr. Emily A. Bruce, native of Wolfeboro, long in practice in Boston, and Anna Taylor Cole, born in Whitefield, in practice in Somerville, are other prominent examples in this line. Ella F. Knowles, a daughter of the town of Northwood, who studied law in the office of Burnham and Brown, in Manchester, gained prominence in that profession in the West and became Assistant Attorney General of Montana.

Scores of New Hampshire women, now active in social, educational and philanthropic work in our own midst, like Mary I. Wood, Susan C. Bancroft, Alice S. Harri- man and Dorothy Branch Jackson, and many others, who, like Harriet P. Dame in Civil War days, were ministering angels for sick and wounded soldiers in the hos- pitals and on the battlefields of Europe in the great World War, are as worthy of mention as any that have been named; but further detail is impracticable.

Let it be remembered, in closing, that, after all, it is not to the men and women born in the State, whose names are written large in the record of human achievement, that credit is mainly due, and honor should be most largely paid. To the mothers of these men and women, and of thousands more at home and abroad, who, in lofty station or lowly lot, have done their duty faithfully and well—to the homemakers and the homekeepers of the State, who from the log cabin days of the pioneers in their stern struggles with nature, on the one hand, and with savage ene- mies on the other, down to the present era of comfort and luxury, have cheered men on in their daily toil, given them new hope and courage, ambition and faith; kept the "home-fires" brightly burning, around which, as in a haven of rest, husbands and sons have gathered in sweet content after the hard day's toil; who have instilled in the minds of their children the lessons of truth and duty, virtue and sobriety, of faith in God and love for their country and their fellow men throughout the world—to these uncrowned queens of our New Hampshire homes are due all honor and praise for New Hampshire's glorious part in the history of the nation and the progress of the world.
