The university wants to ensure that it is supporting students and graduates as they move into their careers. In order to do that, the UNH Alumni Association is working hard to enhance mentoring and career networking programs.

But the association needs help updating the UNH alumni database. That's why it has recently begun an email and social media campaign encouraging alumni to share their current contact and employment information.

“When you share your contact information with us, you assist past and future alumni with their career development,” says Steve Donovan, the association’s executive director. “A robust alumni network is a powerful component of what makes UNH a great university.”

Donovan says the alumni career network will be strengthened by those who have enjoyed lifelong careers as well as those who have changed careers several times since they graduated. “Your on-the-job experiences are exactly what our current students and alumni need to succeed,” he says.

Finally, fresh data will enable UNH to alert alumni to exciting programs and events that are occurring not only in Durham but throughout the country year round.
