1-1-2017

Does the Constitution Allow President to Ban Muslims?

John M. Greabe

University of New Hampshire School of Law, john.greabe@law.unh.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholars.unh.edu/law_facpub

Part of the American Politics Commons, Civil Rights and Discrimination Commons, Constitutional Law Commons, and the President/Executive Department Commons

Recommended Citation

John M. Greabe, Does the Constitution allow President to Ban Muslims?, Concord Monitor, Jan. 1, 2017 at D1, D3.

This Editorial is brought to you for free and open access by the University of New Hampshire – Franklin Pierce School of Law at University of New Hampshire Scholars’ Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Law Faculty Scholarship by an authorized administrator of University of New Hampshire Scholars’ Repository. For more information, please contact sue.zago@law.unh.edu.
Does the Constitution allow president to ban Muslims?

The president-elect has stated that he intends to protect national security by banning Muslim immigration into the United States. He also has signaled an openness to some form of Muslim registration program. Does the Constitution impose barriers to the adoption of such policies?

Since 1868, the Constitution’s Equal Protection Clause has formally guaranteed all “persons” — a term that encompasses non-citizens — the “equal protection of the laws.” Sometimes, this guarantee is described as protecting against governmental “discrimination.” But that description is too general.

All laws that regulate human behavior “discriminate” in some way. Some laws discriminate on the basis of conduct. Homicide laws discriminate against those who have taken a human life. Environmental laws discriminate against polluters. Tax laws discriminate among those who earn different incomes over a specified period of time. Other laws discriminate on the basis of inherent or unchangeable characteristics. Laws requiring that a person be at least 16 years old to obtain a driver’s license discriminate against the young. Laws imposing mandatory retirement ages discriminate against the elderly.

Nearly all such laws are perfectly constitutional if they use rational means to achieve reasonable ends. This is true even of laws that discriminate on the basis of inherent or unchangeable characteristics. And it is true even when a court knows that the fit between a law’s means and ends is likely to be far from perfect. Setting the driving

A Little Perspective

THE WASHINGTON POST EDITORIAL BOARD: “The best response to racism is to call it out, loudly and by name. That’s especially true now, amid an election-fueled surge in hate crimes and hateful public remarks, on social media and elsewhere. The good news is that even as odious and dismayed commentary spreads, it has triggered a forceful response, including, crucially, from President-elect Donald Trump and his advisers.

Politicians cannot be expected to repudiate every insufferable remark by allies and supporters. Still, Trump, who insists he is the “least racist person on Earth,” is well advised to demonstrate that his distaste for political correctness is not license for hate speech. It was therefore welcome to hear his transition team denounce as “absolutely reprehensible” the latest obnoxious racist rant from Trump backer Carl Paladino, erstwhile Republican gubernatorial candidate in New York and now a school board member in Buffalo. Paladino, long prone to raw and racist taunts, had publicly expressed the wish that President Barack Obama would die of mad cow disease and that first lady Michelle Obama would “return to being a male and let loose in the outback of Zimbabwe,” where she would cohabit with a gorilla in a cave. . . . Calling out racists such as Paladino is a good way for the incoming team to show that it does not welcome the support of people with odious views.”

NHwayback

ON JAN. 1, 1926, the Granite Monthly magazine reports on a $50,000 ad campaign by the state to lure new residents. “Some would have us believe that the present publicity campaign is New Hampshire’s dying gasp. They point to the declining rural population, to the exodus of youth from the state and to the slack conditions in some of our industries and conclude that New Hampshire is ‘done.’” Not so, the editor assures his readers.

Paladino

JOHN GREABE
Constitutional Connections

NHsnapshot

Diane Weeks of Greenfield bids a tearful farewell to her husband, Lehnert, a sergeant with the 744th Transportation Company of the Army Reserve, who died in Desert Storm, as he leaves for a federal judgeship. His former colleagues testified saying he thought they were “okay, until he learned that they smoked marijuana.” Sessions denies the Trump campaign statements may complicate non-discrimination claims

CONSTITUTION FROM D1

age at 16 is permissible, for example, even if it is shown that many 15-year-olds are capable of driving safely and many 16-year-olds are not.

So what does the Equal Protection Clause actually accomplish? For the first three-quarters of a century of its existence, the answer was “not much.” During this era, the Supreme Court almost always characterized as “reasonable” the executive and legislative judgments that were challenged under the clause.

Indeed, in 1927, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes derided equal protection as “the usual last resort of constitutional arguments.”

But all of this changed in the following decades. Perhaps prompted by the horrors of genocide, totalitarianism and deeply entrenched domestic racial discrimination, the Supreme Court began to take a different approach to a small subset of laws that discriminate on the basis of inherent or unchangeable characteristics — those that discriminate on the basis of race.

No longer did the court review racially discriminatory laws for mere reasonableness. Instead, it subjected them to a heightened form of scrutiny and held them unconstitutional unless they used narrowly tailored means to achieve a “compelling” governmental interest. This has proven to be a very difficult test to meet.

Soon, the Supreme Court extended heightened scrutiny laws that discriminate on the basis of religion, ethnicity and national origin. And it eventually applied a modified form to heightened scrutiny to laws that discriminate on the basis of gender. The court also extended heightened scrutiny to laws that infringe upon “fundamental” rights, such as the First Amendment right to freely exercise one’s religion.

So what does all of this mean for the president-elect’s plans with respect to Muslims? If the administration adopts measures that explicitly subject Muslims to different treatment on account of their religion, it should anticipate immediate court challenges. To survive these challenges, the government will need to establish that its measures advance a compelling government interest through means that are narrowly tailored — i.e., that are neither overinclusive nor underinclusive.

This will be a very difficult showing to make. Obviously, national security is a “compelling” government interest. In fact, it is one of the very few interests that the Supreme Court has described as compelling. (The court provided this description in the notorious Korematsu case, which held that the Japanese-American internment policy implemented during World War II survived strict scrutiny. The difficulty, however, will be in showing that the measures are neither overinclusive nor underinclusive because the overwhelming majority of Muslims pose no threat to national security.

This, Two final caveats. First, courts are quite deferential to the president and Congress with respect to foreign affairs and immigration. So perhaps the fact that the president-elect’s contemplated measures will touch on these sensitive areas would lead courts to refrain from reviewing them under strict scrutiny.

Second, courts are reluctant to find that policies neutral on their face with respect to religion are in fact motivated by religious discrimination.

Thus, if the new administration were to target immigration from countries deemed likely sources of terrorist threats, a court would not lightly conclude that such a measure discriminates on the basis of religion — even if the affected countries contain largely Muslim populations.

In fact, from 2002-2011, the Bush and Obama administrations administered just such a country-specific immigration policy. It survived constitutional challenges in lower courts. But those administrations also emphasized in their public statements that it was not government policy to discriminate against Muslims.

The president-elect has thus far taken a different approach. As a consequence, if his administration seeks to implement a policy that targets Muslim-majority countries, his campaign statements might well complicate any argument that the policy is non-discriminatory toward Muslims.

(John Greabe teaches constitutional law and related subjects at the University of New Hampshire School of Law. He also serves on the board of trustees of the New Hampshire Institute for Civics Education.)

Pilgrims touch the Kaaba, the sacred Muslim shrine, at the Great Mosque in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Dec. 29, during the minor pilgrimage, known as Umrah.

As Oklahoma attorney general, Pruitt sued the EPA at least 13 times

PICKS FROM D1

Flynn Sr. stays on. Flynn is buddy-buddy with Vladimir Putin. Seriously, with Flynn, you have to wonder: Is there a screw loose? And I am not even mentioning the anti-Semitic tweet. Without equivocation, I give Flynn a 1.5.

Who needs Dr. Strangelove? Who needs Dr. Strangelove? Who needs Dr. Strangelove?

Stephen Bannon, Trump’s choice for chief strategist, was head of Breitbart News, a far-right conservative site that has provided a haven for white nationalist. His Order of Friendship in 2013, the deeper story is what his nomination means for climate change. Tillerson is at the heart of fossil fuel extraction. Will he recommend pulling out of the Paris Agreement? Or will he go forward with pipelines like Keystone XL?

Tillerson has acknowledged that burning fossil fuels does contribute to higher temperatures but he has been part of the oil industry effort to manufacture doubt. “Let Them Eat Cake” award.

Then there is Dr. Ben Carson, the nominee for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. It is hard to know what to make of this pick. When his name was floated, Carson said he felt unqualified to run a federal agency. He was a brain surgeon with no relevant experience.

During the campaign, Trump said horrible things about Carson. He said Car-