Racism and Impeachment Power

John M. Greabe
University of New Hampshire School of Law, john.greabe@law.unh.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholars.unh.edu/law_facpub

Part of the American Politics Commons, Constitutional Law Commons, Law and Race Commons, and the President/Executive Department Commons

Recommended Citation
John M. Greabe, Racism and Impeachment Power, Concord Monitor, Jan. 21, 2018 at D1, D3.

This Editorial is brought to you for free and open access by the University of New Hampshire – Franklin Pierce School of Law at University of New Hampshire Scholars' Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Law Faculty Scholarship by an authorized administrator of University of New Hampshire Scholars' Repository. For more information, please contact sue.zago@law.unh.edu.
Racism and impeachment power

Many commentators have denounced President Donald Trump as a racist following the vulgar and derogatory comments he reportedly made about Haiti, El Salvador, Africa and immigrants from these places. In fact, some have gone so far as to say that the president’s perceived racism should lead Congress to remove him from office. Are they correct? Does racism constitute a legitimate basis for removing a president? More generally, what is the scope of Congress’s removal power?

In all but the most extraordinary circumstances, the remedy for incompetent political leadership — indeed, even abhorrent political leadership — lies in the next election. But the Constitution does provide Congress with tools to remove certain federal officeholders between elections.

As explained in a recent column (“Sexual misconduct, abuse of power...
Impeachment is a tool of last resort, so when should it be used?

CONSTITUTION FROM D1

and congressional self-governance, “Sunday Monitor Forum, Nov. 26), the Constitution authorizes each house of Congress to “expel a Member.” The Constitution authorizes each house of Congress to “expel a Member” with “the Concurrence of two thirds” of its other members (Article I, section 5, clause 2). Thus, Congress holds the power to remove its own members who engage in misconduct.

The Constitution also authorizes Congress to appoint a vice president acting president by two-thirds vote of both Houses if the vice president and a majority of the Cabinet transmit a written declaration that the president “is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office” (Amendment 25, section 4).

There is the impeachment power. The Constitution provides that “the President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors” (Article II, section 4). This provision also has been interpreted to apply to federal judges, who do not face electoral recall but rather “hold their Offices during good Behavior” (Article III, section 1).

In terms of mechanics, the Constitution vests the House of Representatives with the “sole Power of impeachment” (Article I, section 2, clause 5). As with nearly all of its other powers, the House may vote to impeach by a simple majority vote. The Constitution then vests the Senate with the “sole Power to try all impeachments,” and further provides that “no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present” (Article I, section 3, clause 6).

So what are the “high Crimes and Misdemeanors” that can ground an article of impeachment? The Constitution does not say and the federal judiciary - mindful that impeachment is Congress’s prerogative and the principal check it holds over federal judges - has long treated impeachment-related matters as non-justiciable “political” questions. Thus, there is a wide range of perspectives on the issue.

At one end of the spectrum is the belief that “only judicial acts that seriously threaten our political order should trigger impeachment. At the other end is the view, expressed by former President Gerald Ford when he was a member of Congress, that “an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers (it) to be.”

Between these positions, there is fairly widespread agreement that impeachment should be reserved for conduct that undermines our established constitutional order, subverts foundational norms, and cannot readily be addressed through ordinary political or judicial processes.

Thus, impeachment should not be used for mere political disagreements, no matter how deeply felt. Moreover, not all criminal acts by federal office-holders subject to impeachment actually should lead to impeachment. And yet, actions that are criminal can properly serve as a basis for impeachment if they threaten basic government functioning.

Under these principles, should a conscientious member of Congress seriously consider voting to impeach a president believed to be a racist?

To do so in good faith, the member must focus on the president’s official conduct. The member should ask whether the president’s racism is causing him to exercise his vast discretion to interpret and enforce federal law in a manner that is, 1) inconsistent with constitutional norms, and 2) not easily countered through ordinary politics or litigation.

If a conscientious member of Congress were to conclude that the president’s racism is affecting federal policy, these two criteria could be satisfied.

First, the Constitution’s promise of “equal protection of the laws” makes the consideration of race, religion, politics or politics of local police departments - and to improve police-community relations — in the aftermath of recent police shootings of black men.

The administration justified its decision in terms of a need for greater local respect for local police morale and safety. Certainly, these are non-disruptive and important policy considerations. Moreover, the decision is squarely within the president’s constitutional power and discretion. Consequently, even if a conscientious member of Congress were convinced that the president’s racial views actually affected the policy, there is little that he could do within ordinary political or legal processes to counteract it.

In such circumstances, a conscientious member of Congress could consider impeachment - particularly if she were to conclude that the example was not isolated but rather was a part of a broader pattern of racially discriminatory administrative policymaking.

Impeachment is strong medicine. Most understand that the prospect of deploying it as part of partisan politics would endanger the republic. And there seems to be little likelihood that today’s calls for impeachment will go anywhere while the president’s party holds the balance of power in Congress.

But given that lawmakers have placed impeachment on the table, it is essential that we have a serious public discussion of when this tool of last resort ought to be used.

(John Grebe teaches constitutional law and related subjects at the University of New Hampshire School of Law. He also serves on the board of trustees of the New Hampshire Institute for Civics Education.)