IN PRAISE OF ENGLISH

Because of the fact that the coverage editorial is to tell someone—let's say, yourself—what you're doing, it may be natural to sit down and search for your work.

The best way is to describe and praise yourself. And to do it in a way that is helpful and informative, of course.

In this particular case, we'd like to praise the work of the University of New Hampshire for the last few years in the realm of written English. You must have felt a certain satisfaction at the admirable results that have been achieved in the line of interdisciplinary cooperation.

In the present case, there are two stories being told of New Hampshire for students in this field, both more demanding than the normal one.

The first is that we can expect a person among these students, not just a student, but a person who has found his way to the University of New Hampshire, to receive a thorough training in English. The teaching of English at the University of New Hampshire is a well-planned program, and the students are encouraged to develop their skills in the language.

The second story is that while the teaching of English at the University of New Hampshire is thorough and well-planned, the students are encouraged to develop their skills in other areas as well. This is done through the interdisciplinary cooperation that exists among the various departments of the University.

All in all, it is a story that we can be proud of, and one that we hope will continue to be told of the University of New Hampshire.

And if you have followed the course of the University of New Hampshire for the last few years in the realm of written English, you must have felt a certain satisfaction at the admirable results that have been achieved in the line of interdisciplinary cooperation.
