PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S FIRST YEAR

President Franklin D. Roosevelt's achievements during the first year of his administration were paralleled and equalled only by the great deeds and sacrifices of the nation in the war. These United States of ours have for many years been in great need of a leader, a guiding hand, a master of the arts of peace that can give direction and leadership to the world. The national and the international problems of our time have demanded the presence of a strong and able executive in the White House. The need for such a man was urgent and the role of the President became that of a political statesman and public leader. The President's office is unique in American government, and the responsibilities that accompany it are immense. The President must not only be a good administrator, but also a wise diplomat, a skillful orator, and a versatile statesman. He must be able to command the loyalty and support of the American people.

To achieve his goals, the President must have the power to carry out his policies. The Constitution grants the President the authority to appoint and remove federal judges, to negotiate treaties with foreign nations, to receive ambassadors and other representatives of foreign states, and to command the armed forces of the United States. The President also has the power to veto legislation passed by Congress, to nominate federal judges, and to pardon individuals who have been convicted of crimes.

The President's responsibility for national defense is also enormous. He is the commander-in-chief of the armed forces, and he must ensure that the country is prepared to defend itself against aggression.

In summary, the President's role is one of great responsibility and importance. He must be able to guide the country through difficult times, and to ensure the safety and security of the nation.

The New Hampshire, March 9, 1934.

At this early stage it is entirely impossible for me to forecast any outcome of the Scott showing of the New Deal legislation. The public sentiment on almost all the important issues is so strong that the legislation is certain to be successful. The great majority of the people believe in the principles of the New Deal and are prepared to support it. The President has a majority in Congress and is able to carry out his policies. The public is behind him and will give him the support he needs to succeed.

The New Hampshire, March 9, 1934.

Men and women alike are prepared to support the New Deal legislation. The principles of the New Deal are widely accepted by the American people, and the President has the support of both the Democratic and Republican parties. The legislation is designed to meet the needs of the American people and to provide a stable and prosperous society. The President and his administration are determined to carry out their policies and to work for the good of the nation. The legislation is aimed at solving the problems of unemployment, poverty, and insecurity, and at creating a just and equitable society.

The New Hampshire, March 9, 1934.

The United States is at war with Germany, and the President has declared that the United States will not be neutral. The President has called on the American people to support the war effort and to contribute their share to victory. The President has also called on the United States to cooperate with other nations in the struggle against aggression. The President's policies are designed to ensure the safety and security of the United States, and to promote the welfare of the American people.
