designed for working professionals and is offered at UNH's Durham and Manchester campuses.

According to Peter Lane, associate dean of faculty and graduate programs in Paul College, the ranking reflects innovations the university has made to update its MBA curriculum with the introduction of six new specializations, including business analytics, global business, and growth and innovation, plus increased flexibility — students have the option to attend classes on campus or online. Program enrollments have increased 25 percent during the last year.

U.S. News and World

Report based its rankings on five criteria for part-time MBA programs: peer reputation, average GMAT and GRE scores of students starting the program; average undergraduate GPA; average number of years of work experience; and the percentage of the total MBA program enrollment that is in the part-time MBA program.

“The Paul College part-time MBA program offers a rich learning experience,” says Deborah Merrill-Sands, dean of the UNH Peter T. Paul College of Business and Economics.

“Students in our program average 10 years of professional experience. They learn both from one another and from a faculty that brings together experienced practitioners with academics
