recognizes excellent scholarship published during the last five years (2013-2017) on the topic of management and focusing “on important issues for business and society with sound research methods and credible results.” The award is co-sponsored by the Community for Responsible Research in Business and Management.

A committee of 15 reviewers assessed a body of management scholarship, selecting a total of 10 articles and two books to receive the inaugural award.

“We wholeheartedly congratulate the authors for their excellent research that exemplifies the principles of responsible research,” the IACMR said in a press release announcing the winners.

Earle’s work, “If chemists don’t do it, who is going to?” appeared in Administrative Science Quarterly in 2017. The article discusses peer-driven occupational change and the emergence of green chemistry. Earle collaborated with Jennifer Howard-Grenville of the University of Cambridge, Andrew Nelson and Julie Haack of the University of Oregon and Douglas Young of Lane Community College on the article.
